By the closing plenary session, Dr. Mayer had finally realized that he had accomplished very little after six months of hard laboring to massage the White House into action and thus was desperate to convince the White House to adopt immediate measures to alleviate hunger. This would salvage the Conference, and also prove that he had been right all the time in insisting that the Nixon Administration was the best friend the hungry poor ever had. In an evening session on December 3rd with panel chairmen and vice-chairmen he had been urged to convey their strong feelings about doing something now to the President.

Accordingly, he permitted Antonio Tinajero of the United States Catholic Conference to read to the assembled Conference two pages of a document prepared by the combined efforts of seven voluntary action task forces and then took a quick voice vote of the assembled. The chorus of "nays" was small.

Dr. Mayer had originally planned not to allow the Conference to take a vote on any of the matters before it because "recommendations which have the overwhelming consensus of the conference behind them are much more likely to be impressive to the President and the Congress than recommendations by a close vote". In order to dramatize what he sensed to be an emerging consensus around the task force priority document and hopefully push the President into a corner, he adopted the vote tactic. What had begun life on November 16 as the so-called "Chicago Preamble" of the Community Action Task Force had become, many hard-fought drafts later, the central action program of the White House Conference:

TASK FORCE ACTION STATEMENT

INTRODUCTION

In opening the White House Conference on Food, Nutrition and Health, President Nixon said: "This meeting sets the seal of urgency on the national commitment to put an end to hunger and malnutrition due to poverty in America." We who have come here are already firmly dedicated to that goal. The President said: "Our job is to get resources to people in need, and then to let them run their own lives." He did not provide any new or meaningful program by which this can be accomplished. Obviously, he wanted us to do this, and intended that we should do so. To paraphrase the President, we "not only accept the responsibility, (we) claim the responsibility." Therefore, the combined task forces on Voluntary Action by Women, Consumers, Religious Organizations, Community Organizations, Health Organizations, Faculty & Students, and Organized Labor,*present the following action priority program:

I. A NATIONAL EMERGENCY

There is a hunger and malnutrition emergency in this country today. Therefore the President must immediately declare that a national hunger emergency exists, and under existing authority must now free funds and implement programs to feed all hungry Americans this winter.

II. GUARANTEED ADEQUATE INCOME

The overriding remedy for hunger and malnutrition is a minimum guaranteed adequate cash income with a floor of $5,500 annually (for a family of four). The government must also guarantee a meaningful job with a living wage to those who can work, elevation of wages and benefits to those presently underemployed, the "adequate income" to those unable to work of find employment, and maximization of the purchasing power of the food dollar for all.

III. INTERIM FOOD PROGRAMS

As interim measures only, present food programs must be reformed and expanded immediately in order to assure truly adequate benefits and participation by all who need them in all parts of the country.

IV. UNIVERSAL SCHOOL FOOD PROGRAMS

A national free lunch and breakfast program must be made immediately available to all children, through secondary school and regardless of income, that will provide at least 2/3 of the minimal requirements of the Recommended Dietary Allowance, while respecting cultural food preferences.

V. RUNNING THE PROGRAMS

All administrative responsibilities for all hunger relief and nutrition programs must be shifted from the U.S. Dept. of Agriculture to the U.S. Dept. of Health, Education and Welfare, with corresponding shifts in Congressional committee responsibilities. The recipients of these programs must have responsibility for local administration of the programs under standards determined at the Federal level.

*The AFL-CIO endorsed the policy statement in principle with no position on certain specifics.

The Alliance for Labor Action (ALA), including the United Auto Workers, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, and the International Chemical Workers Union, endorses this statement as written.

TO PUT THESE PRIORITIES INTO ACTION REQUIRES THE FOLLOWING:

I. A NATIONAL EMERGENCY

This nation today faces a national hunger and malnutrition emergency. This emergency situation requires emergency action.

While we initiate long-term programs to eliminate hunger in America, action must be taken immediately to deliver FOOD NOW to the millions of Americans whose chronic malnutrition the nation can no longer tolerate. Only within the context of adequate food now can a program of nutrition education for all Americans have meaning.

We therefore call on the President to adopt immediately the following emergency program to feed hungry people this winter:

A. Invoke Section 11 of the Disaster Relief Act of 1969 and like statutes in order to supply free food stamps to meet the needs of hungry people.

B. Instruct the Secretary of Agriculture to immediately revise food stamp price schedules of less than $100 per month (based on a family of four) and at a maximum cost of 20% of income.

C. Instruct the United States Department of Agriculture to implement directly a food program in every county and town in the United States within the next three months using all available funds, including the customs receipt funds (Section 32 funds).

D. Actively support immediate passage and funding of the following essential legislation.

1. The Senate-passed Food Stamp Reform Bill (S.2547)

2. A School Lunch Program Reform which consists of the Talmadge school lunch bill, the McGovern amendments and the Javits proposals.

3. The Economic Opportunity Act, particularly its section on emergency hunger relief (Section 401, Title X), and without the Green-Quie type state control amendments which will in effect destroy OEO.

E. Instruct the Department of Agriculture to immediately require that all schools receiving Federal financial and commodity assistance for their lunch and breakfast programs provide free meals to all children whose families are receiving any type of public assistance.

Because each of these actions is either already authorized or embodied in pending legislation action to meet this emergency can be taken within the next month.

II. GUARANTEED ADEQUATE INCOME

To implement this number one remedy to hunger and malnutrtition, the following program is imperative:

A. The adequate cash income presently at $5,500 annually for a family of four sets a floor. It should automatically follow the cost of living as defined by the Low Standard Budget of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

B. Establishment of government careers in nutrition and allied health professions, in connection with other private and public efforts to solve simultaneously social problems and unemployment problems. These suggestions alone should provide two million new jobs.

C. Grants to encourage and support broadly based organizations of low income citizens in local ownership and operation of such services as food production and distribution.

D. Establishment of housing factories on the order of the automotive industry to serve the dual function of provision of low-cost housing and the provision of jobs at desirable wages. This involves creation of 750,000 to 1 million new jobs to produce 3-4 million housing units.

E. Extension to all working people of the right to bargain collectively for wages, hours, and working conditions, including the right to strike or boycott when necessary.

F. Extension of unemployment insurance coverage to working groups presently excluded, such coverage to be on the same terms and conditions as provided for other workers now covered.

G. Improvement of the scope of Social Security laws with a 50% raise this year, so that the program provides a reasonable return on investment.

H. Reform of certain pricing, packaging, promotion and other food industry policies and practices which add unnecessarily to the cost of food. This cost inflation is unfair to every consumer and particularly disastrous to the poor. We need:

1. Price reduction through mandatory limitation of promotional and advertising expenditure and other means suggested in the Food Marketing Commission Report.

2. Mandatory price marking and posting which facilitates and simplifies price comparison.

3. Effective inspection and regulation to insure availability of safe nutritious food at fair prices and conditions of sale.

4. Mandatory processing, packaging, and labeling requirements to identify and preserve nutrient content and assure accurate and honest promotion.

5. Encouragement of retail distribution systems which take special account of the needs of the poor.

I. Extablishment of a national prepaid health insurance program and new methods for the delivery of health care and extension of existing health programs to all states. The Medicare Bill should be fully implemented by 1971.

The task forces feel that it is especially important to note that many of the above programs can be self-supporting and/or income-producing, and none will require appropriations higher than a fraction of the cost of the space program. Together they should create substantial new tax revenue (4 million jobs should produce an average increase of $5 billion a year in taxes), substantial increase in income through increased buying power, and a saving of $7 billion of funds misspent under the present public assistance programs.

III. INTERIM FAMILY FOOD PROGRAMS

None of the existing family food programs -- food stamps, commodity distribution, emergency food and medical services -- provides an adequate diet or permits the participation of all who have need. Major reforms and expansions are necessary to make sure that all people in need have access to an adequate diet until an adequate income becomes a reality.

As an interim measure only, the food stamp program must be altered so that it can become the primary vehicle for providing an adequate diet to those in need in all parts of the United States and its territories, and on Indian reservations. Free food stamps to those whose income is less than $100 a month (for a family of four), modification of the price schedule so that no recipient must pay more than 20% of his income for food stamps, national eligibility standards, self-certification, a coupon issuance to all recipients equal to the Low Cost Food Plan of the Department of Agriculture, a several-fold expansion of the program -- all are necessary to make the food stamp programs adequate. The commodity distribution program should no longer serve as a means of surplus disposal but should provide direct food aid adequate to a nutritious diet wherever necessary, fully respecting the ethnic and cultural preference of the recipients. Hunger programs of the Office of Economic Opportunity should also be expanded to supplement the above.

We must do the following:

A. The President should support, and the House quickly approve, the Senate-passed food stamp bill. The program should be fully funded and fully implemented in all parts of the United States and its territories, including Indian reservations, before the end of this fiscal year.

B. The Economic Opportunity Act Amendments of 1969, particularly the new section on emergency hunger relief (Title 4, Section 401 - Title X), should be quickly approved and fully funded by the Congress, without crippling amendments subjecting part or all of the programs to state and local government control.

C. The Federal Government should immediately initiate food programs in the 321 counties still without them.

IV. UNIVERSAL SCHOOL FOOD PROGRAM

There must be established a national child feeding program which will make available at least 2/3 of the Recommended Dietary Allowance. This is to be accomplished by implementing a free lunch and breakfast program for all pre-school, elementary and secondary school children.

To assure maximum participation in the program, the following steps should be taken:

A. Nutritious food selected shall be consistent with the cultural preferences of the children to be fed.

B. Funds shall be provided to enable schools, child care centers, and other participating groups lacking adequate facilities for food preparation, to obtain such facilities or to devise ways to provide meals by other means.

C. Community groups shall be eligible to operate child feeding programs.

D. Local poor residents must be trained for careers in nutritional planning and food preparation for employment in the program.

E. Food provided at the schools shall be available at the choice of the children and their parents.

V. RUNNING THE PROGRAMS

There is a conflict of interest established in the U.S. Department of Agriculture in its dual role -- primarily the advocate for the producers of food, and secondarily the distributor of food to the needy. Therefore, all programs relating to the provision of food, food services, food stamps, commodity distribution and nutrition services should be removed from the administrative jurisdiction of the U.S. Department of Agriculture and be established in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, whose primary concerns are the needs and well-being of the people these programs were created to assist. Within that department, the provisions of food services of all kinds should be tied as closely as possible to the provision of overall comprehensive health care. We call on the President to use his Executive authority to initiate these changes.

To provide maximum coordination, Congressional responsibilities for both funding and programming should be reassigned to coincide with the above administrative changes.

The provisions of food services has too often been thwarted by lack of responsiveness at the state and local governmental levels. The poor should run their own programs. Maximum dignified participation by recipients is insured by transferring organizational and operational responsibilities to duly constituted, broad based, local community organizations of the recipients themselves. Certification, review and auditing must be done entirely at the Federal level to circumvent parochial political implications and to insure the protection of individual rights of those presently living in hunger and despair.

From all corners of this nation we have come together out of a deep concern to end hunger in America now. We feel a heavy sense of obligation to follow through on our commitment and on the commitments of this Conference. We brought with us the diversity that is the American people and we believe there is need for on-going active participation of all people in implementing the recommendations of this Conference.

Therefore, we call upon the organizaers of this Conference to provide an effective continuing mechanism by which all of us who have this concern can contribute vigorous continuing leadership to ensure that this Conference produces action. Today is a beginning, not an end, of our commitment to end hunger in America.

And the appropriate beginning is conference-wide adoption of the 5 points.

1. A National Emergency
2. Guaranteed Adequate Income
3. Interim Food Programs
4. Universal School Food Program
5. Running the Programs

ACT III: Non-Response - The President's December 8th News Conference

On December 8th in a televised press conference, President Nixon was asked the following question by Nicholas Kotz of the Des Moines Register and Tribune:

> Q. Mr. President, last week the White House Conference on Food and Nutrition strongly recommended approval of a bill which has passed the Senate to reform the food stamp program, but it's locked in the House, and another bill which would reform the school lunch program, which has passed the House but is blocked in the Senate. Your Administration is reported to be lobbying against both bills. Will you follow the recommendations of your White House conference, and what course of action will you take?
> A. I favor the approach that our Administration has put before the Congress as being the more responsible approach on both scores. I will, of course, consider the recommendations of the White House conference, which will be made to me, at my request, within approximately 30 days.
> There is another recommendation by the White House conference which I unfortunately cannot give really sympathetic consideration to, and that is the one recommending a $5,400 minimum for a family of four in America. That would cost approximately $70-to $80-billion in taxes, or $70- to $80-billion in increased prices. I do not say that to discredit the conference.
> I simply say that all of us in this country want to end hunger in the United States. All of us want the poor to have a minimum floor, and that minimum be as high as possible. All of us, for example, want Social Security to be higher. But when I consider all of these matters, I have to think also of this fact: the fact that I as President am the one who has the primary responsibility for the cost of living in this country. Referring a moment ago to the tax question, it would be very easy for me to sign a bill which reduces taxes. But if I sign the kind of a bill which the Senate is about to pass, I would be reducing taxes for some of the American people and raising the prices for all the American people. I will not do that.

There could be no clearer indication of his contemptuous attitude toward his own White House Conference. As Tom Wicker of the New York Times aptly put it, "the Nixon Administration had rejected publicly and almost out of hand the two principal recommendations of the conference." A brief run-down of where the Nixon Administration now stands on certain of the demands follows:

Hunger as a Disaster/Emergency - Cattle Only Need Apply

On September 18, 1969, Congress passed the so-called Disaster Relief Act of 1969 (H.R.6508), which applies to any "major disaster" occurring anywhere in the United States betwen June 30, 1967 and December 31, 1970. The President signed that Act into law on October 1st as Public Law 91-79. Section 11 of that Act specifically authorizes the President to distribute food stamps and surplus commodities in the disaster area "under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe" if he determines that, "as a result of" the disaster, low-income households "are unable to purchase adequate amounts of nutritious food." The President delegated his authority to determine the need and duration of the need for food stamps and surplus commodities as a result of a major disaster to the Secretary of Agriculture in Executive Order 11495 on November 18. In other words, if the President declared that, because of the prevalence of poverty-induced hunger and malnutrition, a major disaster existed throughout the United States, or in any part thereof, among all of the persons who are at or below the poverty income level (or some lower figure), the Secretary of Agriculture could immediately distribute free food stamps and commodities to all such persons for however long he felt necessary,regardless of any limitations contained in the Food Stamp Act or commodity program.

Does the existence of hunger and malnutrition constitute such a disaster? Moynihan would say no. He claims that "we need to get food stamps into every county in America." The only legal way to do this is for the President to declare hunger and malnutrition a major disaster in this country.

The Act of 1969 refers back to a 1950 disaster statute for the definition of disaster, and both Section 1 of the 1969 Act and the 1950 act define the term as including, but not limited to, natural disasters, such as hurricanes, storms, floods, fires, earthquakes, etc. The 1969 Act is not limited to natural disasters and could readily be interpreted to include socio-economic disasters, such as poverty-induced hunger and malnutrition, particularly in light of Section 11's emphasis on inability to buy the necessary food for adequate nutrition. Senator Eastland, who introduced an identical bill, said he was pleased that food could be provided under it (Cong. Rec. S.10803) and Senator Bayh, the bill's floor leader, noted that it authorized the President "to provide free food stamps" (Cong. Rec. S.10798).

The 1950 act puts the initial burden on the governor of a state to certify his state's need for disaster assistance before the President acts "in any part of the United States." But there is no limitation on who must take the first step in declaring a major disaster throughout the United States. Furthermore, the 1969 Act specifically zeroes in on action by the President, not by any governor. There is no reference whatever in the Act to action by governors. It is up to the President and the Secretary of Agriculture to distribute the stamps and commodities - there is no explicit role for the states nor is there any state cost. The 1950 requirement for a governor's certificate focusses on the governor's pledge to expend reasonable sums to meet the disaster. If the President handles the stamps, the states need not spend a dime.

What is needed then is not a tangled opinion of counsel, but political courage and leadership. The seven Republican supervisors of Stanislaus County, California, have shown the way. On December 9th, the County Board declared the county a state of extreme hunger and poverty.

Stanislaus County, which is located in California's fertile San Joaquin Valley, is the eighth richest agricultural county in the nation. Nevertheless, more than 40,000 of the county's 200,000 citizens are malnourished.

In the past month and a half, two industries have shut down and 3,160 employees in the county have been laid off. The projected unemployment rate for December is three times the national average. By February, the unemployment rate will approach 20%. Even these unemployment figures do not convey the full extent of the disaster, because they do not include unemployment welfare recipients or part-time employees. Taking these groups into account close to one out of three family heads may be without a full-time job by February.

The emergency has placed such a strain on the Stanislaus County Welfare budget that 25,000 welfare recipients will abruptly lose their means of subsistence for three months, for the Welfare Department funds may be completely exhausted. The county's OEO emergency food money has been totally spent. As families lose income and welfare receipts, the 10,105 who bought food stamps in September will be unable to meet their purchase requirement.

Governor Reagan has not responded. USDA Assistant Secretary Lyng, who comes from Modesto, which is the county seat of Stanislaus County, has flatly refused to help his own poor people by supplying commodities under the disaster authority contained in Section 4(b) of the Food Stamp Act. President Nixon is silent.

But USDA is most anxious to declare an emergency or a disaster and deliver food instantly when it appears that livestock may not be fed. On December 2nd, in the midst of the White House Conference, USDA made government-owned feed grain available at reduced prices to farmers in four Mississippi counties (Forrest, George, Lamar, and Winston). The farmers there faced a shortage of feed to carry their livestock through winter. Under the livestock feed program, if the Secretary of Agriculture determines that severe drought, flood, or similar conditions have reduced food supplies to the point where assistance is required to help farmers preserve and maintain foundation herds and other eligible livestock, then feed grains are offered at reduced prices. The combination of Hurricane Camille, a cold, wet spring and a hot, dry summer had damaged or destroyed the corn and hay crops. The cattle would otherwise have gone hungry. In America we feed our cattle well.

Food Stamps and School Lunch - The Administration may have softened its stand slightly on the Senate food stamp bill. In a December 18th press conference, Secretary Hardin attacked the bill less than usual and, at one point, indicated few objections to it. The Administration is, however, fully behind what is emerging as the Nixon-Montgomery Food Stamp Bill, see pages 4 -4 , infra. The Administration is so uninterested in passing new school lunch legislation that it has made no attempt to get even one Republican to attend the two scheduled Senate Agriculture and Forestry Committee sessions to mark up the bills.

Income Maintenance - The President's gratuitous remarks on the Conference's guaranteed income proposal (the questioner had not even asked about it) were misleading. Every individual in America could be brought to the suggested level ($5,500 for a family of four - the President even got the level wrong) for an outlay of $20 billion encompassing 10 million households. If work incentives were added to the flat guarantee so that the Government would continue to make payments on a declining scale until income reached $11,000, the added cost over what is now being spent on income maintenance programs for the poor, including welfare, social security, food stamps, etc. would be $70 billion.

EPILOGUE: The Plea on Behalf of the Indians

At the Conference's closing session on December 5th, Peter McDonald, Executive Director of the Navajo Economic Opportunity Council, made the following plea on behalf of the American Indians, whom, Dr. Mayer had acknowledged in a national television show on December 2nd, were the hungriest of the hungry.

> On Tuesday morning we heard the Great White Father speak to all of us here. He spoke words full of concern. He made many promises. But we have heard promises before. And while our medical knowledge is limited, we are very quick to detect the disease of Forked Tongue in its earliest stages. We will be watching to see if the tell-tale symptoms appear. It is still to early to make a diagnosis.
> Today, we are here by invitation -- in your White House. We appreciate your gesture of concern and your hospitality. And we do not mean to appear ungrateful. But we must find out, for our people, whether the White Man speaks once again with Forked Tongue -- or instead proves that he is worthy of the name Straight Arrow.
> We call upon the Great White Father to act. And because we live in remote places and live with death as our children's midwife, our needs require special action:
> We need immediate, direct distribution of commodities. When your cattle are stranded in snow, helicopters come and drop bales of hay all over the high ridges and deep valleys. But not so for our people.
> We need food we can eat. The land you have left us is often too dry and sterile for us to grow our own food. And the food you give us we cannot eat. It is unusable. It is worm-infested. We have no refrigeration, and no means of storage. So we never see fresh vegetables or fruit.
> We need money to buy food. The BIA has a special welfare program which can pay us more than the states do. But they turn us over to the states -- and we do not get enough to pay for our groceries. Our welfare checks are taken from us by the white traders who run the trading posts and who are also the postmasters on our reservations. We never see that money. And the prices we pay are thirty and forty percent higher than in neighboring towns and cities.

We need to have our treaties honored and protected. Especially the treaties which protect those resources which will provide us with food and income, with water, with fish, with game, and with land upon which we can graze cattle or farm. Those treaty rights are not honored and not protected.

We need a direct distribution from the federal government -- not from the states and couties. Because state and county officials do not give us our fair share. The states and counties feel no sense of duty to us. Local prejudice and discrimination runs strong. The promises to our people did not come from the states or counties. They came from the federal government -- and they should be kept by the federal government.

We have no food stamp program that we are aware of on any reservation -- and we ask, because of the emergency condition that exists on all reservations, that commodity and food stamp programs be run stimultaneously on Indian reservations.

For our children, we seek three square meals a day -- not just breakfast and lunch -- but also a dinner they can take home. We prefer that to expensive boarding school buildings. We would rather they come home with dinner. Bricks and mortar are very hard to eat. We want our children -- and we want them to go to bed well fed in their homes.

We need special foods and special methods of distribution. The government has money for the development of special fortified foods and it gives money to the food industry to help develop such foods for the poor. We would like to see those food companies sit down with Indians to develop food that we can eat, that we like to eat, that can be stored where we have no electricity and no refrigeration, that will keep our babies alive and our children healthy and our grown people alive longer than 44 years.

Indians must be involved in that process. They have to eat the food. They have to do without the food when it does not arrive. They have to carry the food fifty or seventy miles. They have to purchase the food from government licensed trading posts that charge huge profits and huge interest rates.

So above all, in the design of all food programs and health programs for Indians, the white man needs to listen to us, the expert needs to listen to us and the government needs to listen to us before they send us corn meal that we feed to our chickens, powdered milk we cannot mix, flour we cannot store, cheese that is so dried and old we cannot even melt it, and cans of labels we cannot read.

We seek the establishment of an all-Indian Council on Hunger, Nutrition and Health to sit down with food companies, doctors and government officials to find solutions to our problems. If the list of things we have stated sounds long, or excessive, or the conditions unreal, it is because you have turned your back on us, hidden us from your eyes.

We see today that the Justice Department has asked Congress to repeal legislation providing for detention camps. But you have turned our homes, our reservations, our homeland into detention camps. And you do not come near them.

We request that you let us live in dignity.

We do not ask for luxury -- we can make the barren rocks of Alcatraz bloom with our culture. We can make the deserts bloom with the water you have taken from us.

We are the first Americans. You spoke of us first in this conference. But as always you have then ignored us -- and relegated us to last place -- an afterthought.

And now, when we come forward to speak, we are sure you will say these are special and unnecessary demands. At this White House Conference in the White Man's House, this may all seem unreal.

So we invite you to an Indian House Conference. Come to our homes first, then decide. We offer you the words and the wisdom of our fathers:

> Before I judge a man, let me walk in his mocassins for three moons.

But before three moons pass, feed our children while they can still eat.

NEW FOOD STAMP SCHEDULES

On December 18th, USDA Secretary Hardin released the details of changes in the schedules of purchase payments, bonuses, and overall allotments under the food stamp program prompted by his receipt of $610 million to use for food stamps in fiscal 1970. The new payment levels reflect USDA's serious effort to redefine the concept of "normal food expenditures" to meet the new food stamp budget. It was not new studies of how much families spend, but new money for USDA to spend that was responsible.

The purchase price for a family of four hits a peak of 28.8% at a monthly net income level of $250 to $269.99. For a family of eight the ceiling is 33.3% from $150 to $169.99. The previous peaks were 46% for a family of four ($70) and 48% for a family of eight ($80). The tables constitute a major step forward by the Nixon Administration. The extent of the increase in participation they should spur in jurisdictions already in the program depends upon the speed with which they are implemented and the energy with which USDA and local officials make the changes known to the poor. The new tables are appended:

1/ Includes $40 million of administrative expenses and, therefore, only $570 million in bonus coupons. In fact, only $450 million is expected to be spent.

2/ Assumes that 16% of all lunches served are served at a free or reduced price. The 1969 average was 15%.

3/ Assumes that 16% of all general cash assistance is for free or reduced price lunches ($27 million) and adds on 100% special cash assistance ($44.8 million) and USDA projections of lunch expenditures from Special Section 32 funds ($61 million).

4/ Assumes, according to USDA-Budget Bureau calculations, that a maximum of 10% of special milk funds supply milk to children from low-income families.

HUNGER ON THE HILL:
THE STATUS OF PENDING LEGISLATION

A. Food Stamp Reform

Where It's At:

Senate - Major reform measure, S.2547, the McGovern-Javits bill, passed the Senate on September 24 by a vote of 78 to 14.

House - All food stamp proposals are bottled up in the House Agriculture Committee. Hearings have been completed. Intensive mark-up sessions began on December 9 and continued mornings and afternoons through December 17. The Committee has now halted its consideration of the bill and will not resume until January 27th, at the earliest. Even when ready, no food stamp bill is likely to emerge except at the tail end of a bill extending present farm programs (both food stamp and farm programs expire as of December 30, 1970). No floor action on the package is expected before late February, 1970. If food stamps are tied to farm programs, then food stamps will have to go back to Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, while that Committee reviews the farm issues.

Final passage - April, at the earliest.

Contents:

The House Agriculture Committee bill as it now stands is a hybrid property identified as the Nixon-Montgomery bill, the latest surfacing of the Southern strategy - this time apparently to deny food to the poor. Sonny Montgomery of Mississippi, one of a group of less than five Congressmen who has consistently voted against feeding the needy, is the ringleader, with Chairman Poage as an instigator. On December 10 the Committee voted 22 to 4 to reject the Foley-Green bill H.R.13423, and 21 to 4 against the Senate bill, S.2548. The four musketeers were Democratic Congressmen Foley of Washington, Vigorito of Pennsylvania, Lowenstein of New York, and Melcher of Montana. If the Committee decides to release the bill in its present format, the overall impact would be to reduce, not increase participation. The following are some of the highlights (rather lowlights) of the Committee's deliberations to date:

1) State matching - A Montgomery amendment was supported 21 to 7 to require each participating state to put up part of the bonus value of stamps issued to impoverished households within the state or drop out of the program entirely, with the matching starting at 2½% of the bonus and rising 2½% each year thereafter to a peak of 10% as of July 1, 1973. Since, by then, the program should be running at a bonus rate in excess of $2.4 billion, the cost to the states would be $240 million-plus. Mississippi and many other Northern as well as Southern states would jump at this cost-justified opportunity to end the program, as the amendment's sponsor intended. The House Committee added a similar provision in 1967, but was beaten on the floor, 191 to 173.

2) Strikers and students - By respective votes of 16 to 9 and 20 to 5, the Committee determined to deny stamps to strikers or locked-out workers who would not be eligible were they working (a Teague of California proposal) and to students and hippies and the households to which they belong if claimed as dependents on tax returns (a Mayne of Iowa suggestion). Similar restrictive measures have been tried unsuccessfully by the Committee in the past. The striker and student prohibition carried on tellers, 150 to 134, in 1968, but was deleted in conference and then defeated on a roll-call vote on the House floor, 187 to 158.

3) Work requirement - Chairman Poage obtained 14 to 4 approval of his refusal to give stamps to able-bodied adults from the ages of 18 to 65 (including college students and elderly persons eligible for Meals on Wheels), other than mothers, who failed to register at local employment offices and accept jobs at the lowest prevailing minimum wage rate (Federal, state, or Federal contract). If retained, this would be a substantially harsher workfare provision than that contained in Nixon welfare bill.

An abbreviated comparison of the major provisions of the Senate bill, the Administration bill, and the present program follows. The Nixon-Montgomery bill in the House Committee in its present form affects only 2b, 6 and 7.

	Senate bill	Administration bill	Present program
1. Eligibility standards (family of four)	Minimum nationwide level of $4000	Discretion of Secretary, but uniform nationwide and ceiling of $4000	State option, ranging from $1920 in South Carolina to $4200 in New York
2. Purchase price a) Maximum	25% of income	30% of income	Normal expenditures for food, defined as up to 33%
b) Free stamps	For those with incomes of $63.90 a month or less (½ of Low-Cost Food Plan)	For those with incomes of $30 a month or less	No--except in two South Carolina counties
3. Total coupon value (family of four)	$127.80 a month (Low-Cost Food Plan)	$105 a month (Economy Food Plan)	$106 a month
4. Product coverage	Food and items necessary for personal cleanliness, hygiene, and home sanitation	Only food or food products	Only food or food products
5. Certification method	Affidavit	Extensive forms and welfare caseworker investigation	Extensive forms and welfare caseworker investigation
6. Administrative responsibility	Secretary can operate directly or through other local public or private non-profit agencies if no program in operation after January 1,1971,or if Secretary determines that insufficient percentage of poor persons participating	State must provide for operation of either food stamp or commodity program in each subdivision by June 30, 1970 or else entire State forced off program	State agency must request program as well as local welfare agencies
7. Level of funding and term of program	1970 - $1.25 billion 1971 - $2 billion 1972 - $2.5 billion	1970 - $610 million 1971 and 1972 - open-ended	1970 -$610 million 1971 (first half) - $170 million

The Nixon- Montgomery bill changes:

2b - No free stamps. The de facto minimum charge in the present program - 50 cents per person per month for the first six persons in each household and nothing for each additional person would be retained by being made explicit in the law.

6 - No political subdivision would be required to operate any family food assistance program at any time.

7 - The program would be authorized at an unspecified level for a period as yet undetermined that would be co-equal with the term of the farm commodity programs.

Assorted mischief - The Committee has also voted 23 to 4 to remove any requirement that a county operate any family food program and 18 to 9 to delete free food stamps in favor of the Montgomery 50 cents per person minimum. The Committee apparently is in favor of allowing persons 60 years or over to use food stamps to buy Meals on Wheels.

B. School Lunch Reform

Where It's At:

House - Passed limited reform measure, H.R.515, on March 20 by voice vote. Passed additional $100 million for free and reduced price meals for the needy, H.R.11651, on July 21, by 352 to 5.

Senate - House bills and Talmadge proposal, S.2548, are awaiting mark-up in the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The Administration offered no bills of its own. The drafting sessions set for November 19, December 3 and December 17 were abandoned when no Republicans and no quorum appeared.

Final passage - Potential floor fight in Senate over money and some other matters. Conference with House should be no problem. February, at the earliest.

Contents:

An abbreviated comparison of the major provisions of the Talmadge bill, the House bills, and the Administration's formal position follows:

	Talmadge bill	House bills	Administration position
1. Funds for free and reduced price meals	1970 - Additional $155.2 million 1971 - $250 million 1972 - $300 million	Additional $100 million	No new funds needed - opposed
2. Eligibility for free and reduced meals	Retain present inadequate and non-policed guidelines instructing schools to announce criteria	Public announcement of criteria (no real change)	Retain present inadequate and non-policed guidelines instructing schools to announce criteria
Possible floor amendment:	McGovern-Javits - $4,000 nationwide minimum eligibility level for a family of four.
3. Definition of reduced price meal	Not to exceed 20 cents	No definition	Opposed because of lack of adequate funding, which Administration refuses to request
4. Role of food service technology and catering	No change from present policy of, in practice, excluding innovation and private food service management by means of emphasis on non-profit nature of program and restrictive regulations and contracts. Talmadge would authorize $6 million for demonstration projects and $4.5	No change from present policy (see adjoining column)	Hekman, Administrator, Food and Nutrition Service: "I plan to make a study of this." Lyng, Assistant Secretary for Consumer & Marketing Services,: "From experience with this approach [new technology and management techniques]

	million for pilot projects to improve food service delivery methods at State option.		we know that it can result in great economies." Real position: ?, but at political mercy of little old ladies in aprons.

Possible floor amendment: Javits - $25 million authorized for demonstration programs with private food companies for supply, preparation and delivery of food to poverty area schools with limited facilities or none at all.

5. State matching	$1 State to $1 Federal ratio with 5% overall from State revenues in 1972 and 1973 on up to 25% in 1983 and thereafter (Added state input: 1971-0; 1972-$32.8 million)	No change from present $3 State to $1 Federal ratio, but 3% overall from State tax revenues in 1971 and 1972 on up to 7.5% in 1977 and thereafter. (Added state input: 1971 and 1972-$19.7 million)	No change from present $3 State to $1 Federal ratio with no meaningful State input because of state's reliance on children's payments to meet their share. (States now only pay ½ of 1% of program cost from state revenues)
6. Equipment assistance	1970 - $38 million 1971 - $33 million 1972 - $15 million Thereafter - $10 million	No change, although $100 million may be used to finance purchase or rental of equipment	Opposed

C. Emergency Food

Where It's At:

Senate - Passed extension of Economic Opportunity Act, S.3016, on October 14. Emergency food, like all special programs whose authorization was increased in committee, was reduced on the floor to the level indicated in the budget ($100 million to $25 million) by a vote of 47 to 38.

House - Passed extention on December 12, including new Title X, "Intensive Programs to Eliminate Hunger and Malnutrition", which called for $92 million in 1970, special emphasis on feeding the very young and the aging, and permitting community action agencies to operate food programs where counties refuse to do so.

Final passage - The bill emerged from conference on December 18 and was approved by both chambers on December 19.

Contents:

The Senate accepted most of the new language contained in Title X of the House bill, but melted it into Section 222(a)(5) where the program had been defined,although the stress on children and the elderly was deleted. The authorization level for fiscal year 1970 is a specifically earmarked $62.5 million based on the Nixon budget floor ($25 million) plus one-half of the $75 million House add-on. The fiscal 1971 figure is $175 million or the earmarked $62.5 repeated plus additional authorization of $112.5 million or halfway between the Senate's $150 and the House's $75. The major substantive change involves the authority for a community action agency or a local public or private nonprofit organization to administer food stamps or commodity distribution regardless of the fact that a particular board of supervisors refuses to act. USDA would have to cooperate in this effort as it has not in the past (it would not turn over commodities to community action agencies in six California counties).

SICK HUMOR: A MODEST PROPOSAL TO KILL THE HUNGRY OR BOB POAGE TELLS IT LIKE HE THINKS IT OUGHT TO BE

W. R. Poage, Representative from Waco, Texas and Chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, whom age and tenacity have shoved into a position of power to cripple Federal family food assistance and who is the loudest defender of unlimited farm subsidy payments, is at it again. Last April, when his Committee was considering nutrition problems, he labelled free food stamps "socialism" and stated that "in too many cases, the $30 [spent on food before receipt of free stamps], to be really frank about it, will go for liquor, or for pot, or for those sort of things."

In June, Mr. Poage introduced his own food stamp proposals (H.R. 12430) which would coerce all able-bodied adults (there are no exceptions for women with small children) into accepting make-work jobs under the supervision of local officials, with the work to be paid for only in stamps, not cash. Mr. Poage said he would "put them to work even if I had to make jobs, as they do in Russia. Get them to sweep the streets with brooms or push leaves back and forth, just do something."

Having gone in one small jump from condemning socialism to swallowing communism, Bob Poage is now displaying his acute knowledge of apiaries and history. In an exchange in a food stamp hearing on October 31 with Stephen Kurzman, Esq. of the Urban Coalition, Bob Poage revealed his deepest desires:

> "Do you think we can just continue to make it just as profitable to sit under the tree as it is to work, and expect to find as many people working as we have today?
> Mr. Kurzman. I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that we disagree on very basic premises. I think there is very little evidence that any significant proportion of those who receive food stamps or any other kind of food assistance are choosing to do so so as to elect not to work.
> The Chairman. I think that when you make that statement that you just prove that you never lived in an area where there were a great many people who sit under the tree, and that you are entirely out of touch with a large segment of American life and life everywhere.

"It is not only true in America, it is true anywhere in the world that I have been. I have been to some countries in the world. We all know that there are a number of such people . . . I think that some of those people who you are talking about would not work under Communists . . . go back even further than 2000 years, go back somewhere in the dim past and the book that most all of us accept, it says somewhere, "By the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread."

"Now I think that is true. I think it is true when old Adam was kicked out, and I think it is still true. By the sweat of thy brow, that means work as I understand it. That is the way I understand it, if you expect to get the good things of life, to work for them.

"Now, I have not any objection to helping the individual who needs help, and I do not want you to go away from here and say that Bob Poage said that he would not help some poor widow and her kids. He never said anything of the kind. But he has said that he was not going to help some deadbeat who is sitting down at the pool hall waiting for his wife and kids to go out and see what the neighbors bring in.

"Now, if you ask me to help that fellow have a better life down at the pool hall, why I am just not interested in helping him. I am interested in helping that family, but I am not interested in helping that bird who could work just as well as I can. Are you? . . .

"The point I am making is I have not understood why you and others who have appeared before this committee, who have a legitimate and proper as I see it concern for the needy are also so concerned in maintaining a bunch of drones.

"You know what happens in the beehive. They kill those drones. That is what happens in most primitive societies. Maybe we have just gotten too far away from the situation of primitive man."

Genocide, anyone?

"Hunger-Why?" - A Report from the American Friends Service Committee - CRASH, the acronym for the special summer project sponsored by the American Friends Service Committee as a Call to Research and Act to Stop Hunger, has released a final 71-page report on its operations in 35 counties in 15 states. More than 200 people, primarily high school and college youths, investigated the conduct of Federal food assistance programs in those counties and then conveyed the information to local residents. While no tangible changes in the local administration of feeding programs have yet been brought about by CRASH intervention, CRASH had a subtle, but real impact on bureaucrats not used to having anyone ask them questions or monitor their work. A compilation of recommendations for changes on all program levels is included in the report, which can be purchased for $1.25 from Maria Pappalardo, c/o AFSC, 160 North 15th Street, Philadelphia, Pa. 19102.

THE COURTS VERSUS THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH

Counties Without a Family Food Program - Almost one year from the day the suit and 25 companion actions in 25 other states were filed, needy citizens in counties of Texas without any Federal family food assistance program won a major court victory over the United States Department of Agriculture, which has tenaciously resisted providing them with food. On November 19, 1968, the Columbia Center for Social Welfare Policy and Law, acting as lawyers for 1,000 hungry and malnourished complainants sued to compel USDA to begin commodity distribution or food stamp programs in what were then approximately 500 counties without food aid. On November 21, 1969, United States District Judge W.M. Taylor, Jr. in Dallas, Texas, ordered USDA "to put into effect, in the shortest time feasible and at Federal expense, the Commodity Distribution Program in every Texas area that has no food stamp program." Ronald Pollack, Esq. of New York City, represented the plaintiffs.

If USDA complies with the courtorder - and there is every indication it will not - at least 100 more counties would be removed from the rolls of areas offering no food help to their poor families. The Dallas Federal court predicated its decision on the ground that Congress did not intend to deny Federal food program benefits to eligible needy persons solely by virtue of the county of their residence. It interpreted Section 32 in this fashion in order to avoid finding that USDA was denying the plaintiffs equal protection of the laws.

USDA now has to shoulder, as it always should have, the primary responsibility for ending discriminatory deprivation of food assistance. USDA has repeatedly delayed all of the suits and opposed feeding any of the poor complainants. Howard Davis, Deputy Administrator of the Food and Nutrition Service, without taking the Fifth Amendment, flatly refused to answer a total of 60 questions in a court-ordered deposition in Washington on April 11 in the case of Hernandez v. Hardin. In that case, a Federal district court in San Francisco had ordered USDA "to put into effect in the shortest time feasible one of the two federal food programs...in every California county." USDA simply ignored that order. Even Max Rafferty, California Superintendent of Public Instruction and never a friend of any liberal cause, came forward in court to sue Secretary Hardin and declare that Hardin's refusal to act was "an abuse of his discretion and results in a denial of the necessities of life and basic civil rights." Despite USDA's recalcitrance, the court never intervened to place the Secretary and his delegates in jail because the holdout California counties proceeded to install food programs on their own under pressure of the court order. As of June 25, all 58 California counties had accepted one, thereby mooting the suit.

School Milk - 13 school children of farm worker parents living in California sued the Secretary of Agriculture, Clifford M. Hardin, in Federal district court in San Francisco on December 2 charging that he had failed to provide milk to needy school children under the Special Milk Program. The suit, a class action, demands that he furnish free milk to the 10,000,000 American school children from low-income families who now subsist on water in place of the milk they cannot afford.

Plaintiffs alleged that needy school children are deprived of milk because the Secretary of Agriculture has promulgated regulations encouraging a "children's milk tax" or the enforced payment per child of 50¢ in advance every two weeks ($10 a year) as a condition to receiving milk. A farm worker family with six children in school thus has to lay out a week's wages each year ($60) to buy milk for the children or, as is most often the case, they must go without. The suit contends that the children's milk tax has the same discriminatory effect as the now-outlawed poll tax, except that it is more expensive -- Virginia's poll tax is only $1.50 a head.

The suit was filed on behalf of the children by California Rural Legal Assistance, Inc. (CRLA). Robert Gnaizda, Esq., attorney for CRLA and the plaintiffs in the case, said that the suit was based upon the Secretary's fraudulent misuse of the $104 million in Federal funds entrusted to him to supply milk to school children and upon the Secretary's blatant failure to administer the program in accordance with the Congressional dictate "to safeguard the health and well-being of the Nation's children."

LET THEM EAT PROMISES

The Politics of Hunger in America

by Nick Kotz

and Robert F. Kennedy Journalism Award, 1969

This is the first book to explore the politics of the hunger issue in the United States, giving comprehensive coverage to every aspect of this country's domestic food aid programs. It tells how and why the richest country in the history of the world manages to deny food to 15 million of its citizens. It tells what happens to the brains and bodies of American children who don't get enough to eat, and how two presidents ignored secret reports that warned of dire consequences. It tells the story of how politics got the hunger issue going and how politics almost squashed it, and how—behind closed doors of the White House—warring forces at the top level of government are still trying to balance economy against humanity. The book ends with a series of new approaches to the problem of hunger in America and a set of possible solutions.

"(A) deeply moving account...No man is better endowed to describe "The Politics of Hunder in America" than Mr. Kotz."

U.S. Senator George S. McGovern
Chairman, Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs

"I think LET THEM EAT PROMISES will be a very useful backdrop for the White House Conference on Nutrition. I think it is very important that people realize that we've had great difficulties over the years in getting food programs accepted...when you look into it as Mr. Kotz has done, you can see that responsibilities have been very much multiple, and what is needed is not just one parlimentary victory but a change of heart on the part of everybody and a real concern on the part of all Americans."

Dr. Jean Mayer
Special Consultant to the President for the White House Conference on Food, Nutrition and Health

"Hunger and malnutrition will be critical issues for years. By showing us the rocky road already traveled, Nick Kotz prepares us for the way ahead. His book should be read by all who enlist in this most humane struggle."

U.S. Senator Jacob K. Javits
Ranking Republican member, Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs

"The book is a gripping, upside down detective story—a classic who-didn't-done-it to the malnourished poor. It is crammed with clues as to why hunger continues to exist in the United States long after everyone has agreed that not eating may be hazardous to your health....If Mr. Kotz had his way, the solution would be simple and humanitarian....It is unfortunate that he is not making policy instead of so fascinatingly describing its formation."

John R. Kramer
Executive Director, The National Council of Hunger and Malnutrition in the United States

"Exciting, moving...it is a description of the hunger of the poor and the ignorance and callousness of some of our highest elected and appointed officials. This book is a real and timely contribution to a better America. I can recommend it highly—not as a nutritionist but as a concerned citizen."

Frederick J. Stare, M.D.
Chairman, Department of Nutrition, Harvard University

"LET THEM EAT PROMISES is a story that every student of government should read, because it shows how our national government really operates. Nick Kotz's vivid and authentically detailed story explains how the needs of starving Americans were swept under the rug by the provincial autocrats who run congress, and their allies, the faceless bureaucrats of government agencies. This revealing expose shows how personal enmities and political maneuvers, extending from the White House to the courthouse level, can combine to kill even the most urgently needed social legislation."

Congresswoman Shirley Chisholm
New York

"Nick Kotz has written an incisive and searing indictment of our number-one national disgrace—hunger. LET THEM EAT PROMISES is by far and away the best treatment of this problem that I have seen."

U.S. Senator Walter F. Mondale
Member, Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs

"The publication of Nick Kotz's book is a time for tears and outrage—tears for the suffering of the hungry millions whose helplessness he describes, outrage at the unbelievable face that America still refuses to end their suffering....But LET THEM EAT PROMISES has a message of hope....America must hear that message."

Charles Evers
Mayor of Fayette, Mississippi and civil rights leader

"Nick Kotz's new book is honest. It clearly sets forth once and for all that a person denied the right to an adequated diet is also being denied the right to succeed.

"I heartily recommend LET THEM EAT PROMISES: THE POLITICS OF HUNGER IN AMERICA....Hunger is a major problem throughout the world. The reader will gain new insight into this problem and the tragic effects it has on the lives of fellow human beings."

Dear Mr. Rector:

Please accept my apologies for being unable to keep our recent appointment and especially that you were not notified of this.

David Freeman suggested you might be able to help us with a very special problem. Under a new Ford grant we anticipated a special project in the area of prison reform and criminal rehabilitation. This program was based on the assumption of the availability of George Randall of North C rolina to direct it. The heart of this program was Mr. Randall's ability to begin immediate consultation with state and prison officials in the region. There was to be supplementary research and publishing.

As you probably know, Mr. Randall has now accepted a position in Oregon and we are faced with the following questions:

1) Is there another individual, preferably Southern, with qualifications similar to those of George Randall?

2) Are there persons of different qualifications who could make a contribution to this need?

3) Are there variations of this program which are feasible if the project as initially conceived cannot be staffed?

This is a new field for the Southern Regional Council based on our conviction of the need but no experience. We would be grateful for any suggestions and guidance you might be able to offer.

Sincerely,

Paul Anthony

Dear Mr. Rector:

Thank you for your response to our inquiry. We shall look forward to any suggestions Mr. Ward can provide.

The results of our efforts at recruiting a director for this project are, thus far, very discouraging. While we hope it will not be the case, it may be necessary for us to return to the Ford Foundation with a request to use the funds for this project in a different manner. Should that be necessary, we would hope the project could be in an area related to criminal rehabilitation or crime prevention.

I note in your letter that the states we serve are the same as those of your southern regional staff, and that the proposed services of our project are similar to those of your organization. Certainly, we would want to seek the closest cooperation with the National Council on Crime and Delinquency.

Equally important, in the event we had to alter our project it seems sensible to consider programs that might supplement your own work or that which might be concerned with a need which the National Council may be unable to meet.

If either you or Mr. Ward have any further ideas on this, these too would be appreciated.

We shall keep you informed.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

Paul Anthony

Dear Mr. Anthony:

Thank you for your recent letter and no apology is necessary as we understood you would be spending a very short time here in New York. We would enjoy a visit with you, if time permits, when you are next here.

In the interim, I have forwarded your letter to the attention of our southern regional director, Frederick Ward, Jr., 530 Littlefield Building, Austin, Texas.

The states served by the Southern Regional Council are the same as those served by our southern regional staff and, as you know, one of our functions for many years has been providing surveys and consultation to states and communities on probation, parole, correctional institutions and other programs relating to the prevention, control, and treatment of crime and delinquency. Our southern regional staff would, therefore, have much information that might be helpful to you in your project. Because what you are undertaking appears to be a service similar to that provided by our organization, it would be helpful to see how we can collaborate and co-ordinate our efforts.

If you can give Mr. Ward additional details of the project you are undertaking it would be helpful in our efforts to refer potential staff for your project.

I am also referring a copy of your letter to our Information Center on Crime and Delinquency in hopes that if you have not already done so you will be willing to register your project with our clearinghouse.

Looking forward to working with you and with best regards,

Dear Mr. Fleming:

I am so glad you could arrange to be with us as a guest on BRIEFING SESSION.

1:30 - 2:30 3:00

On this program, which we are calling "With All Deliberate Speed," we will look at the current status of school desegregation. The main focus for the discussion will be the question: Is the South moving with all deliberate speed, as the Court ordered -- Is desegration of schools proceeding fast enough?

As you know, the half hour will open with a short background briefing, which will review the six-year history of desegregation, and indicate to what extent and in which areas schools have been desegregated. Then, with Ed Morgan acting as moderator, we will ask you and our second guest to go into areas such as these:

The impact of desegretation on students and committees affected thus far. Have scholastic standards been affected, social mores changed?

The various devices for blocking integration or keeping it to a minimum - e. g., pupil placement laws. Do they serve a valid social purpose - or not?

Can we expect the still-segregated areas of the South to follow the violent pattern of New Orleans - or the orderly pattern of Houston?

Mr. Fleming

1:30 PM

The program will be prerecorded on Monday, March 27, at the N.Y.U. TV studios in the basement of the Carnegie Building at 345 East 46th Street. We would like you to be with us as close to 10:30 A.M. as possible. This will give us time to clarify discussion points before the actual taping of the program from ~~12 to 12:~~30. 2:30 - 3:00

Please let us know if we can help out with arrangements for your trip.

MORGAN:
Welcome to another edition of Briefing Session.	MORGAN
Seven years ago the Supreme Court ruled unanimously that racial segregation of schools is unconstitutional and ordered that all public schools be desegregated "with all deliberate speed." Today, however, in four Southern states...Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina and Mississippi ...not a single school district has yet been desegregated. And in six others, less than one percent of the Negro children are now attending school with white youngsters.
This edition of Briefing Session is studying de-segregation of public schools, and whether the court's edict is being obeyed.
We have two guests, who are involved with the problem:	CUT TO GUESTS

Mr. Harold C. Fleming, Executive Director of The Southern Regional Council + Mr. Everett Tucker, JR President of the Little Rock, Arkansas School Board.

MORGAN: (CONT'D)

I'd like to begin with a question to both of you: Is de-segregation of public schools moving fast enough? MORGAN

(GUESTS ANSWER IN TURN) GUESTS

MORGAN:

We'll go further into these opinions, and other aspects of the school problem, in a few moments. But first, with ~~a report on~~ the facts of school de-segregation as it now stands, here is Briefing Session's News Analyst, John MacVane. MORGAN

CUT TO MacVANE

MacVANE: MacVANE

This year, more than 13 million children were enrolled in public schools in the District of Columbia and the 17 states most affected by the Supreme Court's 1954 decision. Upwards of 10 million of those youngsters are white; 3 million are Negro. Of that total, according to the Southern School News, only 200 thousand Negro children are now attending school with whites. That means only one out of 15 Negro children has felt the impact of the Supreme Court decision.

This is a map of the South which has 6,664 school districts.

CELLO #1: SCHOOL DISTRICTS MAP

Only in the shaded areas has school de-segregation become a fact. Nearly all of them, as you can see are in the Northern border states and Texas. The deep south has yet to become involved. And, as a sidelight, two of the counties in the original cases brought before the Supreme Court... Clarendon, in South Carolina, and Prince Edward, in Virginia... still maintain segregated schools.

POINTS OUT CLARENDON AND PRINCE EDWARD COUNTIES

MacVANE: (CONT'D)

CELLO CONTINUES

CUT TO MacVANE

De-segregation thus far has had three phases.

The first was that of voluntary compliance with the court decision, and involved most of the shaded area you just saw...the border states, the District of Columbia, and parts of Texas and Arkansas. In some big school systems like Louisville, Ky., a special one year period of community preparation preceded actual integration of classes. This phase was largely over by the end of 1956, although some voluntary token de-segregation has continued in North Carolina.

The second phase came in 1956 with compulsory court orders to desegregate communities in the upper south. Little Rock was one of the results of this period.

MacVANE: (CONT'D) MacVANE

In other areas, so-called "token integration" was the rule. For example, in the southern state of Florida only 27 Negro students are now attending ~~Florida~~ white schools. This time also saw the rise of the "pupil placement acts," now in force in nine states. They permit school boards to assign pupils to specific schools after considering such factors as effect on programs, adequacy of preparation, aptitude and the possibility of resulting friction.

The 1960-61 school year marked the beginning of the third phase, involving the great cities of the deep South.

until the process is complete. The first step passed off without incident...white and Negro children moving into the same classrooms quietly. But in New Orleans, the other deep South city ordered to de-segregate last year, it was a much different story.

(HOLD TO MOB SCENE)

On November 14, 1960, 4 Negro children were admitted to William Frantz and McDonough #19 elementary schools in New Orleans, to the accompaniment of the most violent segregationist outbreak since the Little Rock disorders of 1957. NEW ORLEANS MOB

Howling crowds of teen-agers and segregationist mothers staged near riots outside the schools involved, and refused to send their own children into classrooms with the Negro youngsters.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Davis and the state legislature first attempted to seize control of the schools, then withheld funds from the New Orleans school board, then rushed through a massive resistance program to interpose the state between the schools and the federal government. Each act was knocked down in the Federal courts, but the fight went on. Private schools were set up outside New Orleans for white students ~~affected~~, and only a handful went back into the ~~affected~~ integrated McDonough and William Frantz grade schools. The few white children who have gone back have been harassed, threatened with violence and ostracized by the white community.

there have also been instances north of the Mason-Dixon line. Within the last two years white parents in both Chicago and Detroit have staged demonstrations protesting the assignment of Negro children to predominantly white schools. The same thing happened in New York City in 1960, when a number of Negro students were transferred to a predominantly white school because of crowding in their own school district.

The Lincoln school case was brought by the parents of 11 Negro students who had tried to transfer their children to

One of the weapons Southern segregationists are using to bypass the court order is that of state grants to private schools. Prince Edward County, in Virginia, one of the original defendants in the Supreme Court case, is an extreme example of the use of that weapon. It has tried to do without public schools at all, and there is NO public education available for Negro children in any form.

PROPOSAL FOR AN EDUCATIONAL TELEVISION MOTION PICTURE SERIES

ON

RACIAL DESEGREGATION

THE PROJECT

The plan is to produce 8 one-hour filmed programs on the subject of Racial desegregation as a national problem. The programs would be shown on educational television stations throughout the nation.

The series would be produced by Educational Television Station KETC, St. Louis and sponsored by the National Educational Television and Radio Center, New York City.

Ralph J. Tangney, Director of Special Projects, KETC, would act as Executive Producer and Bradford Whitney, President, Condor Films, Inc., St. Louis, would act as Writer-Producer.

THE PURPOSE

The purpose of this series would be to make an objective study of racial desegregation as a national problem. The series would indicate the nature and extent of segregation as it exists in the North as well as the South, the attitudes which must be recognized or changed, the obstacles which must be overcome and the possible solutions to the problem.

As conceived, the series should provide a means of achieving a better understanding between the races and thereby help to create the atmosphere for an orderly and reasonable solution to this complex social problem burdening our nation.

THE METHOD

The subject of racial desegregation is so vast and complex when an attempt is made to embrace the entire nation as an entity, that an organized method for getting a firm grasp of the subject must be found. This method must give the true national picture, achieve the desired purpose we have delineated and at the same time come within reasonable limitations of time and effort. Sampling is an accepted method of scientific research, provided the samples are in sufficient quantity to justify a conclusion about the whole.

With the above premises in mind, we propose to go into five industrial centers, each as representative as possible of a particular area and regional attitude toward segregation.

The Five Industrial Centers. Even though no two geographical locations are exactly alike in respect to their attitudes and progress toward desegregation, it is reasonable to divide the country into six general areas which have a common denominator of acceptance or resistance to it. Here is the way we categorically define these areas to give us the spectrum with which we would work.

Deep South: Very little desegregation. No opposition to segregation, except in isolated instances. Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina.

Upper South: Inclined toward compliance, but slowed by active opposition. Arkansas, Tennessee, North Carolina, Virginia, Texas, Oklahoma, Florida.

Central: Desegregation progressing steadily, but with minor opposition. Missouri, Kentucky, West Virginia, Maryland, Delaware.

Great Lakes: Desegregation accepted with passive attitude. Opposition is resigned to it. Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Ohio.

North: Desegregation actively accepted with proponents in the majority. New England, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York.

West: Because of sparse Negro population, desegregation is not yet of appreciable concern.

All of us can of course pick many individual instances which would appear to belie this tabulation, but it is important to remember we are seeking to establish a pattern only, analogous to the way we talk about a Democratic state even though lots of Republicans are active in it.

If this pattern principle is acceptable, then the next step is to select one industrial center in each category which best typifies the norm in that category. It does not have to be geographically centered in the area, but should be the most completely equipped laboratory for the experiment. This means the city should have a sizeable Negro population, a variety of industries, both as to type and size and varied educational facilities. Because of the first qualifications, the "West" category can be ignored in the series, except as a side issue. This leaves five cities and based on our present research, we suggest these as best qualified to act as the centers for our investigation and for use in the series:

Deep South - Birmingham, Alabama.

Upper South - Greensboro, North Carolina.

Central - St. Louis, Missouri.

Great Lakes - Detroit, Michigan.

North - Boston, Massachusetts.

In the light of further research, it might well be cities other than those listed above would be selected, but we would recommend against the selection of any city which has been such a battleground of segregation that feelings in the community are warped and judgment clouded.

By examining and comparing many different facets of the accommodation of Negroes in each of these cities and then by interpreting the results in the light of probable future trends, we should be able to achieve the intended purposes of the series.

The form that this examination, comparison and interpretation would take is largely explained in the next section, "The Programs". The essence of the project would, however, lie in being able to obtain the services, as consultants and on-screen narrators, the best informed and most thoughtful authorities on each facet in each city. The term "thoughtful authorities" is used advisedly. When we are discussing employment in large industry, for example, we want some person who is working every day "in the market place" with this facet, yet who has the perspective and knowledge to be able to show us, from his experience, what specific problems must be overcome and what ultimate form desegregation will take in this field. The thoughtful authority we have in mind is not the one who holds an extreme view at either end of the spectrum, not the representative of a militant pressure group, nor any person who is so obsessed with "a cause" that we end up with a discussion of prejudiced generalities. What we want is someone who can say, "Here is what is going on here. Here, specifically, is what we are doing about it. Here is what I think is going to happen and why. Eventually, we'll probably end up here in this way." It follows, of course, that a wide spread of opinion will exist among these participants who will be from many different walks of life.

The manifestations of segregation, isolated case histories and unusual incidents are not a part of this series. The normal events and the day-to-day occurrences are what we are examining for the express purpose of defining what the future holds. That is the objective.

Generally, each program would cover a particular facet of desegregation from the viewpoint of five different cities. Each authority on this facet in his city would, on-screen and in the location where he normally works, make the factual examination and render his interpretation as it applies to his particular work. Our motion picture cameras would, through wide use of "cut-away" shots, show on the screen what he is talking about, be it schools, housing, religion, or city planning. Thus, we obtain not only a textual comparison between the five locations, but an important visual comparison, each complementing the other. The end result would be a series of filmed interviews, each on a particular facet of desegregation and each giving a comprehensive picture of the probable course of its future development in a particular location.

It should perhaps be said that a number of our thoughtful authorities should be Negroes. Only by getting all sides of the picture can a proper evaluation be made.

The entire series would be held together and unified by a single moderator who would introduce each participant, introduce each program, explain its scope and provide the transitions between locations. In addition to the principal moderator, one or two men "in the field" would be present to ask questions of the participants and to clarify or pull together the presentations of some of the participants. In this way, an added flexibility is obtained. At the conclusion of each show, the principal moderator would outline the problems, attitudes and proposed solutions presented by the participants so that the audience may draw its own conclusions.

THE PROGRAMS

The topics covered by each program would be tentatively as indicated below. It is presumed that each participant will treat the local situation, the problems which must be overcome, the attitudes which must be changed, the efforts being made and with what success and a forecast of the future appearance desegregation will probably take, especially as it applies to the participant's particular subject.

Program #1 THE NEIGHBORHOOD

Where the Negroes originally came from - where the Negro districts are located, where "break-outs" are occurring - existence of tension areas - percentage of Negro to White population and its effect on the problem - existence of other minority groups and their relationship to the Negro groups in regard to economic competition and social status - blighted areas and plans for urban renewal and development - fair housing commissions - prospective or existing legislation in regard to non-discrimination in housing - private housing developments which use public funds made available on condition that there be no discrimination; methods used to circumvent or to comply with these regularions.

Program #2 THE HOME

Fears of Whites which create resistance to Negro infiltration into White neighborhoods - status anxieties, fears of inundation, fears of property value loss, fears of neighborhood deterioration and fears for personal safety - the validity or lack of foundation for these fears - conditions and proper climate necessary for existence of mixed housing - organized efforts by Whites to preserve "homogeneous" neighborhoods through improvement associations and the like - inability of Negroes to obtain mortgage loans, except for purchase of homes in Negro neighborhoods - policy of real estate boards and brokers - evidences of successful desegregation in housing - "quota" systems, interracial block associations - instances of high-income Negro families living in high-income White neighborhoods where status anxiety does not exist.

Program #3 THE SCHOOLS

Reaction to the 1954 Supreme Court Decision - attitudes of school boards and city elected officials in regard to compliance or circumvention of the Federal implementation decrees - attitudes of White parents in regard to desegregated schools and also having Negro teachers for their children - attitudes of Negro parents and groups in regard to the "separate, but equal school" policy - local and state laws which resist school desegregation and background which brought these laws into being - legally sanctioned plans which obey the letter of the law but impede its free operation (student placement plans, etc.) - comparative quality of schools in segregated areas - effect of segregated schools on White and on Negro children (ambition factor in Negro children) - economic effect of the 1954 Decision on the schools (Birmingham's inability to have any school bonds passed) - the private school and its acceptance or rejection of desegregation - the relation between housing segregation and school segregation (one exists with the other).

Program #4 THE WAGE EARNER

Hiring policies and practices in large plants - non-traditional jobs on the assembly line - opportunities for up-grading Negroes - racial practices in the white-collar field in industries - successes and lack thereof in plants which adhere to a non-segregated employment policy - methods used to overcome prejudice in plants which adopt a policy of non-segregation - policies and practices (not necessarily the same) of unions on the national level and on the local level in regard to admission to apprenticeship training and promotion - efforts on the part of unions to maintain Negro rights in a plant - attitudes of white workers who work alongside Negroes in same type of jobs - extent of association between White and Negro workers in off-job situations - the Negro opportunity for non-traditional work in public service jobs (Police, fire department, city hall, courts, etc.) and in public utilities (telephone company, electric company) and as sales clerks in stores - laws and public policies which further or impede non-discrimination in employment (FEP laws, newspaper classified advertising "Help-Colored")

Program #5 BUSINESS, PROFESSIONS AND HIGHER EDUCATION

Survey of the "successful" Negroes in the community, business executives, architects, salesmen, engineers, technicians, attorneys, newspaper editors, scientists, elected officials and civic leaders - the problems these people had to overcome, because of their race - the extent of association between Negro and White professionals in the same field - admittance of Negroes to membership in business and professional clubs and societies - how much and in what ways the Negro professional depends for his tenure and success upon the White community - the special diplomacy and efforts which must be exerted by a professional, because he is colored

- survey of particular fields still closed to the Negro and reasons for this segregation, as well as attitudes which must be changed to open these fields to him - the opportunity for college education for the normal as well as the intellectually outstanding Negro- segregation policies in admissions to colleges and universities - comparison of academic quality of Negro colleges with White - the opportunity for the Negro college graduate - where the Negro Freshmen come from and where the graduates go - the policy in regard to on-campus residence of Negroes in desegregated colleges and extent of social mixing - fraternities and sororities.

Program #6 LAWS AND CUSTOMS

Survey of existing state and local laws and ordinances, as well as tacit policies which affect discrimination, either to preserve it or to remove it - how these laws and customs came into being and how successfully they operate - the places and institutions affected by public mixing of the races (busses, waiting rooms, swimming pools, libraries, hotels, restaurants, taverns, golf courses, parks, auditoriums, theaters, drive-ins ... and laundromats) - relation of experiences by Negroes of their feelings in regard to discrimination (this is the only place in the series where a personal and subjective treatment is desirable).

Program #7 THE DEPENDENT

The destitute Negro who is a public charge, the economic and social reasons for his prevalence and efforts made to remove him from the welfare rolls - infant and old-age care of the Negro population and evidences of discrimination therein - problems of economic security of the elderly Negro, his inability to provide for his old-age - racial policies and practices of large public and private hospitals in regard to patient admittance and segregation in wards - reasons for racial segregation in those hospitals where it exists - quality of Negro hospitals in comparison to White, both in calibre of staff as well as accommodations - evidences of consultation and opportunities for exchange of professional information between Negro and White physicians and surgeons - opportunities for Negro nurses in both training and in employment in other than White institutions.

Program #8 COMMUNICATIONS

A study of the opportunities and lack thereof for Whites to become acquainted with Negroes in other than menial positions and its effect on White prejudice or compassion toward the Negro - the success and failure of organizations dedicated to increasing inter-racial communication - the efforts of the churches to encourage communication and their success or failure - methods of excluding Negroes from white social and civic organizations and the reasons therefor (political clubs, service clubs, Boy Scouts, etc.) - effect of moral leadership of White and Negro pastors for desegregation on their congregations - the extent of communication between Negro and White church leaders - the varied problems peculiar to White churches in transition areas where the church either flees to the white suburb or accommodates to a mixed congregation.

Dear Mr. Carr:

I am most grateful for your kind and helpful letter of September 28th.

I have sent the new pamphlet out to each of the eleven members on your Executive Committee as you suggested.

I hate to send a bill, but we are so poor we need to; and here is a modest one.

Perhaps your NEA Magazine would care to list the pamphlet. Doubtless that would give it a much broader circulation.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

Many thanks for sending me your interesting booklet. I have examined it with interest.

The first thing I did with it was to take it into our Executive Committee which happened to be in session at the time. I would appreciate it if you would send a copy to each member of the Executive Committee; their names and addresses are given on the enclosed sheet.

If there is a bill for such material, please send it to me for payment.

I think it is an extremely important and useful job to inform local public opinion, so that when the issue is decided by the supreme court there will be a minimum of confusion.

I want, particularly, to commend your action in sending the pamphlet to the Secretaries of the White and Negro State Education Associations in the South. These men and women can play a crucial role.

Very truly yours,

I hope this booklet will earn a minute or two of your attention.

We have just got it out. We want it to be used by local Southern discussion groups, bi-racial wherever possible. Object: To better inform the local public opinion, so that when the issue is decided by the Court there will be less confusion.

I have sent it about widely to church leaders, t labor people and other heads of each Southern State Educational Association and to the Secretaries of the various Southern Associations of Negro teachers

You will see that it tries to be balanced and temperal.

If NEA likes it, I hope you can find some way of helping us to get it spread about and used more widely.

Southern Regional Council

Atlanta 3, Georgia

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

The Office of Education is cooperating with the Joint Committee of the National Education Association and American Teachers Association in developing a packet of materials on intergroup education for leaders of adult community groups. The purpose of this packet is to provide a limited amount of essential materials that will set forth the fundamental principles of intergroup education and describe certain good practices in the field. It will also provide a list of additional materials (other than those in the packet), including audio visual aids, and a guide or manual on the use of the packet and for further study of the subject.

The emphasis in the packet will be on broad, general principles and practices, relating to adult education, rather than on any one particular ethnic, social, economic, cultural, or religious group. However, it should be especially useful at this time in light of the current discussion of segregation and the possible Supreme Court decision.

We are now assembling materials for our committee to study and evaluate and from which they will select the essential items for the packet. In this connection, I am writing you for some specific assistance which I believe your organization is able to give and, which I hope, willing to give.

1. We should like to have sample copies of your materials or publications which you think would be particularly useful in such a packet as indicated above. If you cannot donate the samples, please send them on approval subject to return. If this is against your policy, let us know the price of the materials you suggest.

2. If possible we should like to have you call our attention to materials other than your own which might be considered.

3. If you know of any films, recordings, exhibits, scripts, etc. that might be useful, we would appreciate your telling us about them.

4. If you know of any one who could serve as a resource person or consultant in this field, or any place where a particularly good job of intergroup education has been carried on, please tell us about them.

Any help you can give us in the matter will be appreciated and a prompt reply will facilitate our work greatly. If you are not the proper person to answer the request will you kindly refer it to the proper person. Thanks.

Very cordially yours,

Ambrose

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

This letter is written to acknowledge your kind reply to our inquiry concerning materials in intergroup relations and to express our appreciation for your assistance.

We are in process of evaluating the materials submitted by the various groups for inclusion or reference in the packet which we are developing. When this phase of the project has been completed, we shall be pleased to contact you again with respect to our financial obligation to your organization.

Meanwhile, our deep appreciation is again expressed for your interest in and support of our project.

Sincerely yours,

Copy

Dear Co-worker:

We enclose folders which announce the availability of materials relating to Intergroup Education compiled by our Committee. This project was initiated some years ago without reference to the segregation question and is much broader than that particular issue. However, it has been useful to groups and individuals in schools and communities in defining and attacking the problems of desegregation.

We have assembled selected readings, reference materials, and aids from publications in the field of Intergroup Relations into:

(1) a Kit - designed for teacher-education institutions,
(2) a Packet - designed primarily for adult community leaders.

(These items are being distributed on a loan basis from our office.)

The LEADERS' GUIDE, which is included in the Packet, is prepared with a view of providing group leaders with an over-all orientation to the several aspects of the problems involved in achieving improved human relations. It is also useful for independent study and may be secured separately for $1.00.

If, after reading the folders, you believe the materials will be useful and of interest to you, we hope to hear from you. We would like to inquire if you would be willing to distribute copies of the folders in your community. Our office will also be pleased to forward announcements of the availability of the materials to any individuals or organizations you suggest.

We hope that we may be of service in providing copies of the Kit and the Packet to assist in community and organizational activities in the area of improved human relations.

Dear Dr. Fleming:

The Department of Rural Education will hold its 1961 National Conference in Pittsburgh, September 29-October 1. This will be followed by the Annual Conference of the Division of County and Rural Area Superintents with sessions extending through the dinner meeting on Tuesday evening, October 3. You are most cordially invited to attend either or both of these conferences.

Enclosed are releases which indicate the general plans for these two meetings. You will note that the Department, in its sessions on Friday and Saturday, continues to explore the implications of our changing social and economic situation for education and particularly for the education of children, young people, and adults living in rural areas and our smaller communities. The county superintendents' group has selected as its major emphasis, "Facing up to Change."

You will note that Sunday, October 1, is an overlapping day planned for participants in both conferences. Special activities have been planned which will be of general interest.

Please let us know whether you personally can attend. If not, you may wish to designate an alternate representative. We will be pleased to make available to you, or your representative, a guest card authorizing participation without payment of the registration fee.

Dear Mr. Rilling:

The NEA Commission on Professional Rights and Responsibilities, formerly the NEA Defense Commission, is planning an Off-Record Conference on the Critics of Education and related topics. The meeting is set for Monday, December 10, 1962, at the NEA Headquarters Building, Washington, D.C. The sessions will begin at 9:30 A.M. and conclude at 4:00 P.M. with a luncheon session at 12:00 Noon.

All sessions will be in the 8th floor Horace Mann Meeting Room, except the luncheon. The Commission will be pleased to welcome representatives of your organization as its guests for the luncheon session in the State Dining Room on the first floor. In the interest of general participation, we suggest that each organization limit itself to two or three representatives at this conference.

The Off-Record Conference is a chance for you to express yourself freely and not be quoted or publicized in any way. In line with the last year's recommendations, a summary will be prepared with pertinent conclusions without mentioning names or organizations contributing the points or items of information.

Developments since our last conference have made us believe it will be wise to devote the morning session to discussions of the recent activities of the destructive critics of education (including the rightist groups), and the afternoon session to the matter of effective ways of dealing with censorship problems. Other topics of current interest include: rightist influence at recent elections, and the 1962 National Survey of Critics and Criticisms. There will be a few brief talks at each session. The major emphasis will be on discussions and sharing of the latest information and successful techniques in meeting these problems.

We shall look forward to meeting with you or your representatives at the December 10 meeting. It would help us if you could let us know whether or not you could attend by returning the enclosed questionnaire. We would also appreciate any suggestions as to discussion topics and other groups that might be included.

Some of the persons accepting places on our program and their topics, to date are:

Dr. Erling Hunt, T. C., Columbia University - "Censorship Then and Now"

Mr. Wesley McCune, Group Research - "Round-up of Rightists' Influence in Recent Elections"

Miss Barbara Byers - "State of the Nation Report on Critics, 1962"

Dr. Glenn Snow - "Teaching About Communism"

I am sending you this memorandum about the proceedings of last week's meeting for reference and refresher purposes in anticipation of future meetings, whenever they may occur. I thought this form would be of more practical use than formal minutes.

I. Outline of purpose and scope of "Two-Way Integration Program"

The "two-way integration program" was outlined briefly as follows:

a) Purpose - A pilot project to accelerate the use of newly-created opportunities for racial integration in institutions of higher education in the South as a result of recent favorable court decisions and changing public opinion.

b) Scope - The project as tentatively planned will be limited to private undergraduate colleges including the church-related ones. It will probably involve, in the beginning, from ten to twelve predominantly white southern colleges and five to six additional predominantly Negro colleges. It is hoped that about one hundred Negro students and fifty white students will be involved in the first phase of the program.

c) NSSFNS role - To bring into the program selected colleges which will admit students of the opposite race; to recruit, select, counsel and refer qualified students for admission and scholarship assistance at those colleges; to provide them with supplementary scholarship aid, when needed; and to carry on a follow-up study of the effects of the program on the students, the campuses, and the surrounding communities.

d) Financial support - About 20% of the total needs of the program has already been allocated by a local foundation. It is hoped that the balance will be obtained from another national foundation.

e) Recruitment methods - It is hoped that the recruiting of qualified and interested high school students will be done through local groups set up in each community by our staff members, as well as through the high schools and existing community organizations.

II. Selection of Colleges (see tentative list attached)

a) Special Situations in Regions Significant to the Program - Dr. Mitchell briefly described the differing regional situations in the South and confirmed our original judgment that the program could only be successful in those regions with at least a moderately favorable climate, namely, the thirteen border states and the District of Columbia. Dr. Mitchell also confirmed our original view that no progress would be made at this time in Georgia, Mississippi, South Carolina, Florida or Louisiana, excepting New Orleans and Shreveport. He also emphasized that the climate in the communities surrounding the colleges might be even more important than the broad state situation. In general, areas in which the Negro population is thinnest, will be the most fruitful areas in which to get started.

Dr. Mitchell advised that the program must be handled through devoted people, and with as little publicity as possible. The liberals in the South say that "anything can be done, if it is done quietly."

b) Criteria for Selection of Colleges - It was the consensus of opinion that colleges selected for the program should have the following characteristics:

1) All of the colleges selected should have sufficient status and accreditation virtually to assure graduates entrance to the graduate or professional schools of their choice.

2) The Negro and white groups of colleges, respectively, should be in approximate balance in academic standing.

3) No more than 1/3 of the efforts of the program should go into the enrollment of students of the opposite race in colleges already having more than three or four such students.

4) The names of several colleges not on the original list were suggested as possibilities by various members of the Committee.

c) Dr. Mitchell proposed that foundations should be sought which would be receptive to making gifts to colleges willing to break down segregation barriers and, conversely, which would withhold them from those clinging to a segregated pattern. The same idea would hold for large national church groups and their affiliated colleges.

d) Mechanics for Arrangements with Colleges Selected - After considerable discussion, it was agreed that, in principle, colleges should be solicited for the program individually and brought together as a group only after, or towards the end of, the first year of the program's operation.

III. Recruitment and selection of students

a) Negro Students - In general, it was agreed that the NSSFNS experience in the recruitment of Negro students was sufficient to make much discussion on this point unnecessary. The following new suggestions were made, however:

1) To be as aware of the surrounding community's attitudes as of those of the colleges.

2) To refer students to colleges having the same religious, regional, or socio-economic background as the student.

b) White Students - Recruitment

1) Recruitment Sources in the South - Church leaders, particularly women, some ministers, NEA representatives, CIO community relations representatives, ADL, AJC, ACLU, ADA, and NAACP branches, as well as the Negro state agent of each state education Department (Dr. Mitchell agreed to furnish lists of individuals in these various groups and to write letters to each about the program, as well as the names of the members of the regional and affiliated committees of the Southern Regional Council.)

2) Recruitment Sources in the North - Dr. Covalle suggested the use of selected New York City high school principals whom he would call together. He felt that other minority groups represented in the New York City high schools would be a fruitful local source from which to recruit white students.

3) Recruitment Methods - It was agreed that white students could be best recruited in the South through southern whites and Negroes, through Negroes, in both instances, with as little publicity as possible. It was further suggested that the encouragement of transfer and exchange students, particularly between southern Negro and white schools, would be a helpful stimulant to the project.

4) It was felt also that the distinction should be maintained between recruitment and selection. It was felt that recruitment and preliminary screening could be effectively done by local committees but that final screening should be left to professional staff.

c) White Students - Selection and Screening

1) It was agreed that the most important factor in the selection and screening of students was healthy motivations. Suggested healthy motivations were: 1) a major interest in sociology, 2) financial need, 3) a unique or superior curriculum in a given field obtainable at a college, predominantly of the other race, 5) convenient geographical location and 6) the successful experiences of other students who have already attended colleges of the other race.

2) Dr. Clark made the following recommendations with respect to screening for motivations: a) white students from the North should not be selected for top scholastic excellence only but for all-around qualities, such as extra-curricular achievement, good social adjustment, leadership, etc., b) that by far the most effective method for screening out the neurotically motivated student would be the administration of combined Rorschach and Thematic Apperception Tests. If the administration of these tests (approximately $25 per student) is beyond the financial means of the project, he recommended the use of careful interviewing by skilled interviewers rather than the use of paper and pencil, personality tests. He recommended that the approach to interviewing be general rather than by the direct question method.

IV. Follow-Up Study

This topic was left for consideration at a future meeting.

V. Additional Advisory Committee Members

It was agreed that, in addition to the present members of the Committee, there should be added a representative of the admissions office or administration of each college involved in the program, as well as a few selected high school principals or guidance counselors.

The deep appreciation of board and staff of the NSSFNS is again expressed to members of the Committee who have given and have promised to give so generously of their time and energy.

Subject: Job opening - National Scholarship Service and Funds for Negro Students

Last week George Mitchell visited with me at Pendle Hill, and he indicated that Richard Plant of the above service would be interested in filling a number of jobs. These jobs have to do with his project of integrating Negroes into so-called "white colleges", and integrating white students into "Negro colleges". He would prefer to have someone who has experience in college placement and admission work and could be either Negro or white. The person should be reasonably young so easy rapport with students could be developed. The job will consist of a great deal of travel in the south on both the recruiting and replacement operation, and I hope that if you have someone in your files who might not have been entirely suitable for college secretary, or who otherwise might meet the requirements very generally set forth above, that you would put them directly in contact with Richard Plant at the National Scholarship Service and Funds for Negro Students, 31 West 110th Street, New York City 26, N. Y. Thank you very much.

Dear Dick:

I would advise you to go to some trouble to clinch your possible arrangements with Grace Hamilton. She is incomparable, and you could not further your plans better than by getting a slice of her time.

Josephine Wilkins we know well and greatly admire. She is white, perhaps 45, and possessed of a small independent income by reason of family ownership of a cotton mill. She was brought up in Athens, Georgia, with a close relationship to the University of Georgia. As a young woman she shook loose from the conservative nexus of cotton mill owners in her family, came over to Atlanta, and began to work at good causes.

Her great achievement in the last ten years was the Georgia Citizens' Fact-Finding Movement. Miraculously, this concerned a whole string of agencies—labor, farm bureau (!), churches, Chambers of Commerce, manufacturers—and commissioned a paid staff to dig up the facts about poverty and discrimination and backward services and a long string of Georgia topics. The series of bulletins that came from the Fact-Finding Movement were the most important stimulus behind the victory of Ellis Arnall as our one liberal governor some years ago. The Fact-Finding Movement is now liquidated (all debts paid and a tiny surplus remaining!)

Josephine has not been fully well for the last year or so, and though she is back in the city, she has not taken up full-time duties. I greatly doubt that she would be interested in travel out to the colleges. Her strength is more in moving others to do their duty than in direct negotiation as principal to principal in most cases. She would be a noble one to advise you.

Warmly,

George S. Mitchell

Dear George:

In accordance with our talk in Chicago and with the letter which I have since received from Mrs. Hamilton, I have suggested to her that, if we can agree on the amount and distribution of the time which she could make available to us, that we would then be very happy to have her come to New York at our expense.

Since speaking with you, both Dan Dodson and Shelby Southard, whom I met in Chicago, have recommended a Josephine Wilkins of Atlanta. Do you know her and if so, could you tell me a little bit about her and, would you endorse this recommendation? Furthermore, neither man has her address in Atlanta. Will you please let me have it, if you can?

Best regards.

Dear Dick:

Mr. Mays is out of the city until October 8 or 9, and on account of my own travel, I cannot see him (unless, fortunately, on the 8th) until after his Board meeting October 20.

One of the things which would be important, I should think, to Dr. Mays is the problem of the Georgia law, which conditions tax exemption for the properties and endowments of educational institutions open to the general public upon separation of the races. The language is: "Provided further, that all endowments to institutions established for white people, shall be limited to white people, and all endowments to institutions established for colored people; shall be limited to colored people . . ."

So far as I know, this act has never been tested in the courts. I do know that, as it stands on the books, it has given pause to some important boards of trustees in the State. Mr. Mays would, of course, be aware of the Georgia statute, and doubtless would have legal advise as to it.

So far as the general Georgia situation goes, I would say, with little hesitation, that tactically, the considerations which would weigh against Morehouse opening are insufficient to stand in the way of that progressive step. One reason is that Atlanta, as a metropolitan center, traditionally performs more liberally in these matters than the rest of the State. The worser sort of State politicians picks at these Atlanta abberations from the Georgia pattern and makes political capital out of them. But the political drum fire is not, as a matter of habit, permitted to stall progress in this city.

Whatever potential disadvantages tactically might result from Morehouse opening in this way would be greatly lessened if the newspapers, and particularly the minority press, would permit the matter to proceed for a year or two without comment. There are things to do to increase the probability of such a quiet arrangement, and I will raise this matter with Mr. Mays.

In short, go ahead. It is Mr. Mays's responsibility and that of his trustees to wrestle with the problem of the law. If they feel secure enough on that, any other considerations do not, in my judgment, outweigh the gain. But it is important to proceed as quietly as possible.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

Dear George:

As you will recall, at our July meeting we decided that, while the Atlanta University colleges measured up, in every respect, to the standards we are seeking for the "two-way integration" program, the Georgia climate was not as yet favorable enough to include them in the program. In spite of this, Paul Lawrence, on one of his field trips to Atlanta, talked with Dr. Mays who stated that Morehouse was ready and willing to accept white students and would be happy to participate in the program, if invited. I wonder, in the light of this new information, how you feel about it and, whether or not, you would want to discuss the whole issue with Dr. Mays. I think we are all agreed that we want results, rather than a scrap, in this particular program. On the other hand, I dislike to turn away an institution that is both qualified and willing.

I am not writing Mays in pursuance of his conversation with Lawrence until I hear further from you. However, the Morehouse Board meets on October 20th and he has asked to have all of the information, including an invitation, to present to that meeting. An additional complicating factor is that Harry Carman is also a member of their Board.

Please let me hear from you. With best regards

Dear Dr. Mays:

I have talked with Paul Lawrence about his recent meeting with you in Atlanta. Needless to say, we would be very happy to have Morehouse as a participating college in our new "two-way integration" project but, before either you or we make this joint decision, I would ask you to consider the question carefully in the light of the fact that we, as I am sure you too, are looking for results from the project, rather than conflict. The NAACP and other organizations are doing a magnificent job of carrying on the fight; our objective is to capitalize on the victories; the two jobs, we believe, cannot be done within the same organization.

All of this leads up to the question of whether the Georgia law, the State administration, and community climate might combine to make a "cause celèbre" out of a few white students being enrolled at Morehouse or whether it can be done quietly and discreetly?

I would like you to think this over and I also have asked George Mitchell, who is a member of our Advisory Committee for this project and also our authority on southern affairs, to discuss the matter with you. We are quite willing to abide by your joint decision.

Meanwhile, I am happy to send you herewith a draft of the section about this program which will appear in our October "Chairman's Report," not yet published, and also an invitation to join our Advisory Board of College Presidents. The invitation is not in any sense conditional upon Morehouse's active participation in the program at this time. We would like to have you with us in any event.

With kindest regards.

I've tried to talk to Bennie Mays several times, but he's been out. Meanwhile, I have written him that I think he is in the clear to move ahead.

I still don't know who is the man for you. I am to see in the next few days a man named Van Cleve Geiger from Jacksonville, Florida. He is something of a Friend, interested in these matters, but I don't know whether he has anything that gives him entre to registrars. Will look him over.

Meanwhile, I would be able to do a lot of advising of anybody you pick. He could treat Atlanta as home base and come back in here and discuss each situation with us in the Council, and we would all do our best to steer him.

Dear George:

I hope you are going to be at the NAIRO Conference. If so, I have a number of matters I want to discuss with you in connection with the "two-way integration" program. First, we haven't yet filled that southern field job, although we have had a number of "near-misses." If you can think of any possible candidates, please let me know in advance or tell me about them in Washington. Secondly, I hope by then you will have had a chance to talk with Mays about Morehouse's participation.

I look forward to seeing you at the Conference, if you are coming, and if you are not coming, please advise me directly by mail about the two above-mentioned matters.

Dear George:

I hope that I will get to see you in Washington. At any rate, I want to tell you that we have finally found somebody for the southern job. Miss Mary E. Theobald of Louisville, Kentucky is taking on the job, for at least an experimental period. Miss Theobald has had heavy experience over a long period of time in newspaper work, was Director of the Kentucky War Fund, Assistant to the President of Transylvania College, Field Representative of the American Social Hygeine Association.

Many thanks for all your trouble in trying to help us fill the job.

Miss Theobald is going to spend the next couple of weeks here in the New York office and, after that, I want her next step to be either to see you in Washington during the NAIRO Conference or in Atlanta. Will you please advise me which would be most convenient and when?

Dear Dick:

A few weeks ago I was in Arkansas and ran across an interesting thing. The University of Arkansas at Fayetteville has made arrangements under which graduate courses (other than those leading to the Ph.D. or Ed.D.) may be taught at State-supported colleges other than the University itself. In practice this means the six State Teachers Colleges, as follows: Arkansas Polytechnic Institute, Russellville; Arkansas State College, Jonesboro; Arkansas State Teachers College, Conway; Henderson State Teachers College, Arkadelphia; Southern State College, Magnolia; Arkansas A&M College, Monticello.

In any given year, practically all of these colleges do take advantage of the arrangement. The courses are provided during the regular school year and not in the summer. Instructors may come down from Fayetteville or be members of the staffs of the cooperating colleges. The document under which the courses are provided is called "Conditions under Which the University of Arkansas Will Offer Graduate Courses in State-Supported Schools." In the conditions, under item III, "Students," item D, is: "Qualified Negro graduate students shall be accepted in courses offered."

Under this arrangement, Negro graduate students have within the last two years taken graduate courses at each of the six institutions, thoughI was told that one of them does not, for the moment, have any Negro graduate students.

All students taking these graduate courses at the State Teachers Colleges are enrolled at the University itself, and they merely receive credit toward their graduate degrees by reason of attendance at courses offered at the State Teachers Colleges. So that they are not in a formal sense enrolled at the State Teachers Colleges.

It is therefore correct to say that Negro graduate students have been in attendance at each of the six above listed State Teachers Colleges.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

Dear George:

Thank you for the information about the State of Arkansas. We can use it.

I am sure it will interest you to know that during this counselling season, we have referred 263 students to 13 formerly all-white southern colleges. We won't have any results until summer but I am sure they will be gratifying. The converse part of the project, on the other hand, has produced virtually nothing although we have tried very hard. It appears that it is going to take cumulative effects of several years of recruitment to make any real progress. I hope to be seeing you soon.

Dear George:

Thank you for your letter. The consensus seems to be with you on Richmond and close to you on Houston. We thought Dallas would be a better bet because of the American Friends Service Committee's activities there in the last few years and because Houston is geographically difficult as an area of concentration, so that we have finally selected Richmond and Dallas.

Dear George:

I am enclosing herewith the working staff memorandum for use in the southern project to be launched this fall from a grant from the Fund for the Advancement of Education. I want to invite your particular attention to page 1, I b 2), page 2, II b) and c), and page 4, section entitled "For I, b, above." These sections all relate to the demonstration project for the experimentation in utilization of community resources for discovering talent and the selection of two cities, one in the east-south and one in the west-south, for these two demonstration projects. The cities under consideration in the east are Richmond and Atlanta and in the west, Memphis, New Orleans and Houston.

In addition to the criteria for selection of these cities mentioned in the memorandum, we think we have to avoid cities in which there are one or more better Negro colleges. This is the reason for leaving out Nashville and one of the reasons for questioning Atlanta.

Would you be good enough to give us your advice as to which cities could be most effectively utilized for these two demonstration projects?

Best regards.

MEMORANDUM

FROM: RICHARD L. PLAUT

TO: PFL, DNW

OUTLINE FOR SOUTHERN PROJECT (second draft)

I. Purposes and Goals of Project

a) To identify, within specified geographical areas, those Negro high school seniors with the ability to qualify for admission and scholarship assistance at inter-racial colleges; to provide them with the necessary tools to further their college aspirations (i.e., advice and information about choosing their colleges and applying for admission and scholarship assistance); to take the necessary steps to see that they follow through with completed applications for admission, scholarship, CEEB tests, etc., where necessary, and; to determine the supplementary scholarship needs of those who have been accepted and awarded insufficient scholarships by colleges.

b) To develop and test techniques of working with local community groups and committees to secure their active and effective participation in the process of uncovering talent, in order to:

1) provide machinery for a more thorough search for local talent than can be made by staff representatives working alone.

2) utilize local groups and individuals in pre-screening prospective students for inter-racial colleges, publicizing scholarship opportunities in such colleges, and counselling interested prospects who need advice and guidance in making their decisions.

3) establish groups of local people who can carry on unaided at a time when and if staff representatives are no longer working in the area.

c) To provide accurate information about the magnitude and quality of talent which exists and the dimensions of the financial need.

d) Collateral activities of the Director and co-Director of Field Services, Southern Project will be 1) to carry on the preparatory school recruitment program, as at present; 2) to maintain the usual field visit relations with the southern colleges participating in the "two-way integration project."

II. Scope of Project

a) The Core Areas

The cities and schools in which the intensive part of the project will be carried on are tentatively indicated on the attached list. The responsibility for these areas will be divided on a geographical basis, as marked on the list, between the Director and co-Director of Field Service, Southern Project.

b) The Peripheral Areas

The existing counselling and referral activities will be carried on by correspondence in schools in other areas in the South, not part of the core project, as at present.

c) The Demonstration Projects Involving the Community

Two cities, one in each of the two geographical areas (Southeast and Southwest), will be selected for the demonstration projects. It is hoped that the results attained will be helpful in planning for participation of other communities in the Southern Project.

III. Methodology of Project (This memorandum covers methodology for I, a and b, above, only; separate memoranda will be developed for I, c and d).

For I, a, above

a) First series of visits to schools (September and October)

1) To meet with top ranking 10% of seniors at each school in a group for the purpose of explaining opportunities available in inter-racial colleges and opportunities offered under this project.

2) Immediately after this orientation, to secure names of those in the group who a) wish to participate in the project; b) intend to go to predominantly Negro colleges, and c) do not intend to go to college at all, even though they can qualify and the necessary financial help is available.

3) To administer an aptitude test to all three sections of the group.

4) To distribute DO YOU WANT TO GO TO COLLEGE to those who wish to participate and whose test scores qualify them (see criteria below) with instructions for its use.

A. Group One——Total score 1100 or better
Group Two——Total score between 900 and 1099
Group Three—Total score between 750 and 899
Group Four——Total score between 650 and 749

B. Participation in significant extra-curricular activities; varsity athletic participation in schools with senior classes exceeding 50 students; membership in the National Honor Society; or election to major student bodies such as the Stu-Council, the Senior Class may qualify the student for elevation from Group Four to Group Three, etc.

C. The balance between the verbal and the mathematics sections of the S.A.T. will be considered in referring the student to any college, along with the sex of the student and his career objective, for example, an even balance between the verbal and the mathematical score is preferable to a wide difference between the verbal and the mathematics. Example: 400 Verbal plus 400 math is better than 500 verbal and 300 math.

EXCEPTIONS:

1. For girls - generally speaking a high verbal score with the math score taking a place of lesser importance is not unusual.

2. For technical or engineering students - more weight is given to a high math score although the verbal score must not fall below the minimum.

5) To return to home office test scores of non-qualifiers, as well as test scores of those qualifiers not wishing to participate in the project, broken down according to reason for not wishing to participate, i.e., Negro college or no college at all.

b) Second series of visits to schools (November and December)

1) To confer with each senior, individually, who has filled out an "Information Form" with transcript attached, about the appropriateness of his college choices, or, where necessary, to help them make those choices.

2) To enter final choices and other necessary notations in the appropriate places on the "Information Form".

3) To advise student how to make applications for admission and scholarship assistance, CEEB tests, etc., to the chosen colleges.

4) To return complete file on each student including filled-out "Information Form", transcript, and test score sheet to home office.

c) Third series of visits to schools (January and February)

1) To check with each student, whose "Information Form" has been returned to home office after second visit with respect to completion of all necessary applications; to consult with those who still have unresolved questions; to ascertain who had not completed applications and why; and to stimulate completion of uncompleted applications, when appropriate.

d) Fourth series of visits to schools (April and May)

1) To determine acceptances and rejections by colleges; incidence and amounts of scholarship awards by colleges; and supplementary scholarship needs of successful candidates and to distribute "Application Forms for Supplementary Scholarship Assistance" to them.

2) To make a breakdown of those rejected according to reason or complex of reasons for their not making it, i.e., not enough financial means plus assistance; Board scores or other entrance examinations too low; proper applications not completed.

3) In summary, the results of this final series of visits should provide us with accurate information on what happened to each student whom we have contacted and, as nearly as possible, why it happened.

For I, b, above

1) Selection of cities for demonstration projects

Criteria in selecting cities will include size of population, strategic location and importance, quality of schools, interest of school administrators, community leadership, and community action experience.

2) Representation on local committees

To include high school principals, representatives of Greek-letter fraternities and sororities, church groups, interracial organizations or groups with intergroup programs, heads of civic organirations such as the Urban League branches and NAACP offices, as well as individuals known to be interested in the objectives of the Southern Project.

The question, still unresolved, is whether to permit these groups to function primarily on their own; or to work, collaterally with them, with the schools; or as a third alternative to work with them during the first year and to put them on their own during the second year. In any event, the end goal is to determine in which way the students may be best identified and served.

For I, c and d, separate memos to follow.

TO : Foundation, corporate, campus chest, and individual friends of the National Scholarship Service and Fund for Negro Students

FROM: Harry J. Carman, Chairman, Board of Directors

I am happy to send you herewith the report of our activities for our operational and fiscal year ending September 30, 1953.

This, the fifth year of our existence, has turned out to be far more than merely a chronological anniversary, for, in this year, we are proud to be able to say that:

1. As a result of our efforts, 474 students were admitted to 224 inter-racial colleges with $197,000 worth of scholarship assistance, an increase of 47% and 106%, respectively, over last year.

2. The first nineteen students, 15 Negro and 4 white, were admitted to 11 newly inter-racial colleges, predominantly of the opposite race, under our "two-way integration" project.

3. Four leading eastern preparatory schools accepted their first Negro students as a result of our referrals.

4. The Fund for the Advancement of Education of the Ford Foundation has made us a substantial grant for a two-year study and "talent-search," involving the discovery of able Negro youth in the southern states, their placement in college, together with sufficient supplementary scholarship assistance to enable them to enroll at the colleges of their choice.

I am taking this opportunity to address a few words about our finances, particularly to those of our friends among foundations, college campus chests, and individuals whose financial support have made these achievements possible.

We still have a long way to go towards our goal of equal higher educational opportunity in an inter-racial environment for each individual Negro student who can benefit from it.

Contributions are deductible for income tax purposes

Our on-going regular program, our ground-breaking preparatory school program, and our still pioneer "two-way integration" project must go forward at a cost of about $50,000 per annum. In addition, we are embarking on the south-wide talent search and study project financed by the Fund for the Advancement of Education of the Ford Foundation.

Paradoxically enough, this project leaves us with a new financial problem. Under the project, two classes of 150 freshmen, each, will enter inter-racial colleges with the help of supplementary scholarship awards from us. The "Fund" grant provides no scholarships for the upperclass years of these students, who must be allowed to complete their education as long as their financial need continues and their scholastic achievement justifies it. For this specific purpose alone, an additional $115,000 is needed over the next two years.

We hope for the continued and new support of our foundation, corporate, and individual friends in order to carry forward the two pioneering projects in the South.

We hope for increased campus chest allocations to carry forward our on-going program, so that student funds will continue to be used for the benefit of students.

All these and many more facts about the year's activities, are discussed in the enclosed "Chairman's Report."

Dear Dick:

I had written Parrish, but circumspectly, without any faintest suggestion that you would pick him up. The letter had not gone out and I have held it and have written him without any reference to you.

I still think there is some use you could well make of his knowledge and contacts. I assume the College is paying him for his sabbatical year so I don't suppose he has any pressing money problem.

Sincerely yours

Dear George:

I am sorry I missed your telephone call this morning and I am hastening to write you to head off any suggestion you may be making to Professor Parrish about us before I have a chance to advise you of the circumstances.

We do appreciate your thinking of us and we are very much aware of Professor Parrish's ability and standing in the educational community. It would be an honor to have him representing us in any capacity but I just cannot think how we could take advantage of his availability for the period of one semester. We are now right in the middle of our southern program and Paul Lawrence of Howard and Donald Wyatt of Fisk, who are on leaves of absence, are carrying out the job for us and are able to cover as much territory as we feel should be covered at this time. In view of this, I cannot think of any way of utilizing what I know would be the very able services of Professor Parrish.

I hope this reaches you before you have communicated with him. If not, and you think it wise, I will be very happy to write him directly.

Thank you again for thinking of us and best wishes.

As ever,

Dick

Dear Dick,

As luck would have it I've promised to be in NY January 21-29, first for Dan Dodson's show, and then Jan. 25-29 for some institute Art Elder is having for ILGWU. Probably I'll see you at Dan. Dodson's performance. Anyway, when you come here use our office for HQ, and get any dope you need from Harold Fleming.

Plan for local committees looks good.

Dear George:

Paul Lawrence and I will be in Atlanta on January 27th, 28th and 29th, in connection with the project of community participation in the discovery of able Negro students under the grant from the Fund for the Advancement of Education. I hope you are going to be in town during this period so that we may consult you and so that you may perhaps join us in meeting with Warren Cochrane and a few other Atlanta people who are interested in the project.

Please let me know when you will be available during these days. I am enclosing a memorandum about the project for you to think about meanwhile.

I look forward to seeing you. Best regards,

Addition to Memorandum, "Outline for Southern Project," in reference to I, d, above.

Procedures in working with communities:

1. Since Negro community leaders and organizations will be the best sources of contact with student prospects, it is expected that Negroes will compose the majority membership on the local committee. In most cases, however, school administrators and school board members will be invited to participate by virtue of the importance of their positions. By the same token, white persons known for their interest in interracial progress will be given the opportunity to serve in any way in which they can be helpful.

2. In order that local groups and individuals can be prepared to work effectively within the framework of the NSSFNS program, it will be necessary in the very beginning to explain fully the background and experiences of the Agency, its basic philosophy and objectives, and its plans and procedures for helping Negro youth secure wider college admission and scholarship opportunities. When this has been accomplished, machinery should be set up through which the local committee can function in coordination with the NSSFNS field directors.

   The idea must be sold to the local group that better education for their youth should be a local responsibility and that our chief role is to initiate effective action, supply professional advice and guidance, and make available additional scholarship funds in deserving cases where scholarships awarded by the colleges are not sufficient. The NSSFNS representative can visit a given locality only periodically but a local committee can render on-the-spot service the year around.

3. The local committee when organized must play a proninent part in planning and implementing the local program, with the NSSFNS representative gradually receding to the background as the committee acquires proficiency in following through with its responsibilities. Although the NSSFNS will have much to contribute in the way of techniques and skills, the community leaders are more familiar with the local community and will know best how to deal with local situations and personalities which require special treatment.

4. Since it is our goal to have local community groups eventually take over many of the functions the NSSFNS must assume at the outset, they must be given increased responsibilities as rapidly as they are able to operate on their own. While it is understood that the NSSFNS must perform the major part of the technical and professional services the first year, it is hoped that the situation can be reversed the second year.

   If the organization of the community groups and the training of the membership in the functions that will be required show favorable progress, it is conceivable that the local committee will be able to carry on as a self-sustaining organization beginning with the third year of operation.

A suggested program for local committees as self-sufficient service agencies:

a. The preliminary screening of good scholarship prospects in the senior classes of local high schools, using as criteria: school records and grades, scores on standardized tests conducted by the schools, extra-curricula leadership, personality and general deportment, etc. It is absolutely imperative that school principals, teachers and counsellors who have access to school records and contact with students be included on the local committees and assigned major roles in the screening of students with scholarship possibilities.

b. The administration of college aptitude tests, either at the end of the junior year or immediately following the opening of school in the senior year, for the purpose of edtermining the class of college to which each student might aspire. This is to be followed by individual conferences in which this information will be imparted to the students and each advised in terms of several colleges suited to his needs and abilities. As in the case of a (above), this work should be headed by the responsible school people.

c. Provision for qualified committee members to consult with the parents of youth who have the ability and interest for enrollment in colleges of high standing.

d. The development of programs, in cooperation with high school counsellors, which will inform students shortly after they enter high school, as to college entrance requirements and recommend subjects they should take in preparing for college-level training.

e. The establishment of a fund and advisory services to help through high school the unusual student who has exceptional promise but is handicapped by family, financial, or related circumstances.

f. The sponsorship of "College Day" programs which will bring to the attention of students opportunities in interracial colleges in other areas, as well as those in close-by Negro colleges.

g. The study of colleges located in the community which may be segregated at present, toward the end of doing everything that seems feasible and practicable to expedite a chance to an interracial student body.

Dear George:

I hope you people down your way enjoyed the same kind of unrestrained celebration on the "big day" as we did up here.

As far as the immediate effect of the decision on our program is concerned, we would expect it to be in early or immediate opening up of private undergraduate colleges to Negro students - colleges which could be fitted into our "two-way integration" project. I know that sometimes you hear of these situations before we do. This is to tell you that we would very much appreciate your letting us know of any that you hear about.

Best regards.

I can't say that I know Dick Plaut and the work of the National Scholarship Service and Fund for Negro Students intimately, but I have been in Plaut's office and have talked to him two, three, or four times. I have had lunch with him two or three times, and we have talked over the work to be done in the South.

I think he is doing a good job of fetching out Negro students from the South and getting them into white campuses where they never would have gotten. I do not think they ever got going with lodging white students into Southern Negro colleges. But Dick Plaut is a wise fellow, temperate, and unrelenting in his drive, and his purpose is right. If I had $500 extra I would give it to Dick Plaut, and if I had $5,000 extra I still would.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

Thank you for your letter of August 21 and the material which you subsequently sent us, which we found interesting.

Mr. Richard L. Plaut, of the National Scholarship Service Fund for Negro Students, visited with me recently, seeking financial assistance for the work of his organization. We are sympathetic to the general objectives of this organization, but are somewhat concerned whether their fund-raising ability is adequate to the problem of operating a truly significant program. We wonder, also, whether their overhead may not be disproportionately high.

One individual familiar with the subject stated that he did not believe that the Service was doing as much as it could to motivate young negro students to acquire further training. He stated further that the National Scholarship Service Fund for Negro Students is probably unknown to a very large proportion of young negro students.

If you are familiar with the organization, and feel so inclined, we would greatly appreciate your opinion on the several points raised, giving us any information which you think would aid us in reaching a decision on whether we should make a grant to them.

Mr. Erich Gottlieb
National Information Bureau
205 East 42nd Street
New York 17, New York

Dear Mr. Gottlieb:

I have reviewed the response sent to you on August 21, in my absence, to your inquiry of August 7. It is, I trust, satisfactory for your purposes, though I would like to supplement it in one or two places by this letter.

Our tax exemption has been re-affirmed on occasions since it was originally granted. Most recently, the Internal Revenue Service reviewed, this past May, our activities and records for the year 1962, and on August 5, 1964, by Form 3087, notified us that all was in good order.

It may be of interest to you to know also that prior to undertaking the Voter Education Project (referred to later in this letter) we petitioned the Treasury for an advance ruling regarding it. A favorable ruling was given by letter of March 22, 1962.

I am particularly interested, however, in supplementing the reply to your query on page 2 of your questionnaire "Do you consult or cooperate with other established agencies in the same or related fields?"

Much more important than our work as secretariat of the Southern Interagency Conference are the following two activities:

(1) In 1954 the Southern Regional Council ceased being, in the usual sense, a membership organization, and established in each southern state, with the aid of a sizeable grant from the Fund for the Republic, state Councils on Human Relations, to which our membership was transferred. These state councils, after 1957, became legally and financially autonomous, and each of those still existing subsequently received its own tax exemption. This includes the Councils on Human Relations in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Alabama, Kentucky, and Arkansas, and in the cities of Houston and Atlanta. A newly re-established Mississippi Council has not yet obtained tax exemption. We have continued to work closely and even intimately with these state councils and their local affiliates, even though the formal organizational ties are severed. Among the ways we have worked with them is by administering a grant-in-aid program of approximately $50,000 a year, contributed by the Field and Taconic Foundations.

(2) The Voter Education Project is a large effort of experimental research in which we have been engaged since early 1962, and which will wind up its field work this fall. Through this program we have made grants to a number of agencies to carry on voter registration work throughout most of the South. Strict reporting procedures are enforced, both as to program and finances. We have had under continuous study the methods used and the effects achieved through these registration programs. On completion of the field work, we will prepare a report, to be published as a book, examining the causes of low voter participation in the South, the best methods of overcoming them, and the efficacy of organizational efforts to counter balance environmental factors.

Our audit does not report income and expenses for projects, only for general operations. Consequently, in the totals given to you on page 3 of your questionnaire there is some mingling of receipts and income, and expenses and disbursements. A copy of our audit was, however, sent with our reply, and I assume that you have all the information you need. If you should wish further information or clarification, please let me know. You will have noticed, I am sure, that a very large part of our recent income, nearly one-half, has gone into grants to other organizations through the grant-in-aid program to state councils and the Voter Education Project, but considerable amounts also through other projects, as shown in Exhibits F, H, and L of our audit.

We do not use a fund-raising brochure. This year, for the first time, we prepared a notebook of materials for this purpose -- a copy of which is enclosed. From the size of it you may correctly infer that only a few copies were assembled, and have been used for only special purposes.

I believe this completes our reply. If there are other questions, please let me know.

Sincerely yours,

Leslie W. Dunbar
Executive Director

Les,

Since the subscribers (contributors and members) to NIB include Carnegie, Commonwealth, Field, Ford, Rockefeller etc., and one of its board members is Maxwell Hahn, I thought we should send them everything they asked for, and Paul agreed. He went over the questionnaire with me to check my answers, and I also checked with Ruth to be sure the questions re money were correct.

It would seem that this organization was set up by the foundations and others for the purpose of being an investigative agency so they could reassure their boards as to the worthiness of the requests they receive.

I hope I did right.

Dear Mr. Gottlieb:

Your request for detailed information on the Council was received after Mr. Dunbar had left on vacation; in the interest of giving you the information you need as quickly as possible, the letter was referred to me for reply. I have checked my answers on the questionnaire with two other staff members to be sure they were accurate. If Mr. Dunbar wishes to add anything to the information I am sending, he will write you sometime in September.

The enclosures you requested are all here with one exception: the fund-raising booklet. We are in process of assembling another twenty-five copies, and you will receive two copies within a week or ten days. The two pages of typed information on the Council's aims and program are from copy being prepared for a mailing piece; when it has been printed we will also send you copies of this. The fund-raising book includes samples of our publications.

We have added the NIB to our mailing list, as you requested.

After you have had an opportunity to examine the replies on the questionnaire and the enclosures, if you have any further questions please let us know.

This Bureau is now receiving inquiry about Southern Regional Council.

So that we can report adequately to our members who may be asked to cooperate or contribute, would you please fill out one copy of our enclosed questionnaire and return it to us (the second copy is for your own files.)

It is our experience that individuals and organizations who consult the Bureau respond more quickly when these full facts are made readily available to them. A description of the Bureau itself appears in the enclosed.

Basic Standards in Philanthropy

Philanthropic operations entail a high degree of responsibility because of the element of public trusteeship involved. Compliance with the following standards is considered essential for approval by the Bureau:

1.- BOARD - An active and responsible governing body, serving without compensation, holding regular meetings, and with effective administrative control.

2.- PURPOSE - A legitimate purpose with no avoidable duplication of the work of other sound organizations.

3.- PROGRAM - Reasonable efficiency in program management, and reasonable adequacy of resources, both material and personnel.

4.- COOPERATION - Evidence of consultation and cooperation with established agencies in the same or related fields.

5.- ETHICAL PROMOTION - Ethical methods of publicity, promotion and solicitation of funds.

6.- FUND-RAISING PRACTICE - In fund-raising:

(a) No payment of commissions for fund-raising.
(b) No mailing of unordered tickets or merchandise with a request for money in return.
(c) No general telephone solicitation of the public.

7.- AUDIT - Annual audit, prepared by an independent certified public accountant or trust company, showing all income and disbursements, in reasonable detail. New organizations should provide a certified public accountant's statement that a proper financial system has been installed.

8.- BUDGET - Detailed annual budget, translating program plans into financial terms.

SHORT QUESTIONNAIRE FORM

The National Information Bureau, a non-profit corporation, was founded in 1918 with a two-fold purpose: (1) to maintain sound standards in its field of philanthropy and (2) to aid thoughtful contributors to give wisely. The accompanying folder gives more detailed information and lists the Bureau's eight basic standards.

Among the members of the NIB are foundations, business corporations, chambers of commerce, local united funds, community chests, councils of welfare, and individuals. Present members are located in more than 1,000 communities.

Potential contributors of money or leadership, who consult the NIB, may respond more quickly when the facts in this questionnaire are made readily available. The filing of information with us also may obviate the necessity of answering similar questions from numerous local communities.

NATURE OF WORK

State the chief objectives of the organization. The Council was established to work on social problems in the South. It learned quickly that race is basic to all of them. Until the South emancipates itself from racial inequity, it can't make any rational progress on its other problems. The Council's future is to be a part of the South and have its programs develop with the issues and opportunities of the regio

Give a brief concrete statement (on a separate sheet if necessary) of the present work of your organization, directed to the above objectives:

see separate sheets: ~~B~~ 4

How many local branches or chapters currently? None

Do you consult or cooperate with other established agencies in the same or related fields? Yes; SRC is secretariat for group of more than 50 agencies which meets quarterly

Is your work duplicated or paralleled by other organizations? We try very hard not to duplicate the work of any other organization.

If so, please comment:

There is parallel work by all agencies working in race relations, civil rights, and civil liberties in the South. ~~SRC serves as secretariat for an informal gathering of over 50 agencies in these fields to avoid duplication and to plan cooperation~~ The informal group mentioned above meets for the specific purpose of avoiding duplication & fostering Coop. & exchange of ideas.

WISE GIVING

NIB

This is the NIB

Since 1918, the National Information Bureau has offered its members a confidential, impartial advisory service covering hundreds of organizations that solicit contributions on a national and international level.

A nonprofit institution dedicated to maintaining and strengthening standards of philanthropy, NIB has not only exposed flagrant charity racketeers but also has not hesitated to question the unethical practices of some of the giants in the field.

NIB MEMBERSHIP GIVES YOU

. . . confidential reports on more than 500 individual organizations soliciting contributions for national and international philanthropic programs. These reports are sent to you upon request, when you need and ask for them. For legal reasons, reports are released only to members.

. . . newsletters and bulletins, two to three times a year, containing information of interest to the concerned giver.

. . . special consultative services, including the checking of contribution lists for members wishing to insure the wise distribution of their philanthropic dollars.

. . . a national watchdog service to help keep philanthropies in its field true to the ideals and standards that should characterize all charitable organizations.

Wise giving is important

Americans give an estimated 8 billion dollars each year to charitable, philanthropic and religious organizations. Most of these organizations are reasonably sound, but unfortunately some are not. A few are downright frauds. Others are guilty of mismanagement or of irresponsible use of contributed funds.

To protect their giving, many thoughtful contributors have joined NIB. Their support helps also the NIB's efforts to maintain sound standards in its part of the philanthropic field.

are foundations, corporations, chambers of commerce, individuals, and united funds, community chests and councils in about 1,500 communities. The following foundations and corporations, listed by special permission, are illustrative:

Foundations:

Carnegie Corporation • Commonwealth Fund
Field Foundation • Ford Foundation
Grant Foundation • Ittleson Family Foundation
W. K. Kellogg Foundation
New York Community Trust
Rockefeller Foundation • Russell Sage Foundation

Corporations:

American Telephone & Telegraph Co.
CBS Foundation Inc. • Ford Motor Company
General Mills, Inc. • International Harvester Co.
Johnson & Johnson • The Kroger Co.
Metropolitan Life Insurance Company
National Broadcasting Company, Inc.
The New York Times
The Pfizer Foundation, Inc.
Procter and Gamble Company
Schenley Industries, Inc. • Sears, Roebuck and Co.
Shell Oil Company • Socony-Mobil Oil Co., Inc.
Standard Oil Company of California
Time Incorporated, etc.

Basic standards in philanthrophy

Philanthropic operations entail a high degree of responsibility because of the element of public trusteeship involved. Compliance with the following basic standards is considered essential for approval by the Bureau:

1. BOARD — An active and responsible governing body, serving without compensation, holding regular meetings, and with effective administrative control.

2. PURPOSE — A legitimate purpose with no avoidable duplication of the work of other sound organizations.

3. PROGRAM — Reasonable efficiency in program management, and reasonable adequacy of resources, both material and personnel.

4. COOPERATION — Evidence of consultation and co-operation with established agencies in the same or related fields.

5. ETHICAL PROMOTION — Ethical methods of publicity, promotion and solicitation of funds.

6. FUND-RAISING PRACTICES —
   (a) No payment of commissions for fund-raising.
   (b) No mailing of unordered tickets or merchandise with a request for money in return.
   (c) No general telephone solicitation of the public.

7. AUDIT — Annual audit, prepared by an independent certified public accountant or trust company, showing all income and disbursements, in reasonable detail. New organizations should provide a certified public accountant's statement that a proper financial system has been installed.

8. BUDGET — Detailed annual budget, translating program plans into financial terms.

NIB results

consider for prospective contributors such questions as:

Finances: What were income and disbursements last year? Current budget? Accumulated assets? Are contributions tax deductible?

Evaluation: Is the organization reasonably responsible and effective? Does it meet the eight basic standards of the NIB? In addition to providing facts, the NIB frequently offers comments and conclusions, growing out of more than four decades of experience, as an aid to members for their consideration.

Memberships

Contributor members provide most of the NIB's essential income each year. Some contribute and join because they believe that support of our work to maintain and strengthen standards and practices in the field of philanthropy should be an integral part of their own philanthropic giving. Some join to become eligible to receive our confidential reports on philanthropic organizations that are sent individually to members on request. Some join because they both want our reports and believe strongly in our basic standard maintenance work.

The minimum annual contribution membership for an individual is $15.00 and for a corporation or foundation is $25.00, deductible for income tax purposes. Memberships are available at these moderate rates to assure that small donors, as well as large, can have access to essential information for wise giving.

But the NIB could not finance its program on this minimum basis. Fortunately, many contributors wish to join as regular members at $100.00 to $500.00 a year, and often increase their support as they become better acquainted with our program. Thus, individual memberships range up to $500.00 annually, corporation memberships and contributions to $750.00, and foundations to $2,000.00.

Whatever membership contribution you care to make, however, we warmly welcome your support and hope you will join us. Every new NIB member means another informed donor who can contribute with assurance to this country's reputable philanthropies and ignore the appeals of national organizations that do not measure up to basic standards.

All contributions and memberships to NIB are deductible for income tax purposes.

Are YOUR contribution dollars supporting

. . . an organization that raises contributions by mailing up to 40 million items of unordered merchandise to the public each year? Approximately 79 cents of each dollar received in return is used for promotion, postage, and merchandise, leaving only 21 cents of the contributor's dollar for administration and welfare work.

. . . an organization that lists among its sponsors a number of prominent leaders including two college presidents. Actual control of the organization rests in a Board of Directors consisting entirely of members of its paid staff. The more contributors give to it, the more the staff can vote salary increases to themselves.

. . . an organization whose name is a by-word in many homes, yet for eight years its annual income has averaged one million dollars more than its expenditures for welfare services? It now has accumulated assets totaling more than 16 million dollars, primarily to serve about 250 direct beneficiaries per year.

. . . an organization that recently mailed more than 11 million fund raising letters in one year, misleading the public as to the scope of its work? It then falsified its financial report to hide the cost of its fund raising, which was more than 68 cents out of each dollar contributed.

What they say about the NIB

"The more help . . . from such agencies as the NIB . . . the more productive . . . giving will be."

— THE NEW YORK TIMES

"You have . . . been most helpful . . . in giving us confidential details about the finances, organization and purposes of many groups that have sought financial aid. . . . It would indeed be difficult for this Foundation to operate effectively without this kind of service."

— A $100,000,000 FOUNDATION

"Most folks want to help people less fortunate, however they are afraid of giving to improperly administered institutions. I'm impressed with the thoroughness with which the NIB goes into the qualifications of these agencies and delighted to be a member."

". . . suggestions by the NIB . . . will help protect you and your pocketbook. . . ."

— READER'S DIGEST

"We appreciate the excellent reports. . . . It is assuring to contributors to know that there is an organization like NIB doing this important work . . . and doing it so well."

—A MANUFACTURING COMPANY

"The effect of the bureau's vigilance is far out of proportion to its own budget. . . ."

— SATURDAY REVIEW

"We are very happy to renew our membership and . . . to increase it. . . . We appreciate very much all the help you have been to us."

— A $20,000,000 FOUNDATION

". . . the NIB, the Dun and Bradstreet of philanthropy."

— TIDE

". . . this Company is increasing its support of the Bureau to $500. . . . Again may I take this opportunity to thank you for being so cooperative."

— A NATIONAL CORPORATION

"Company executives are advised to consult their community organizations . . . or the NIB when in doubt about solicitations."— BUSINESS WEEK

Dear Mrs. Lieberman:

We have reviewed your summary of our Financial Statement, and it appears to be all right. There is a typpgraphical error which you probably have already detected in Section I; unfortunately, we don't enjoy any income from taxes.

Your summary shows excess expenses over income for general operations last year, and this is correct. Receipts and disbursements for general operations were, however, in balance as you know. I think your inquiry is the final push needed to get me to order some changes in the format of our audit and financial statement; a format which considerably predates my occupancy of this job. I have thought for some time that we need a more clear and easily comprehensible presentation, and we shall have one.

With best regards,

Sincerely yours,

Leslie W. Dunbar

Dear Mr. Workeen:

Your letter of May 15th to Mr. Dunbar has been received. Mr. Dunbar is no longer with the Southern Regional Council but is now executive director of the Field Foundation in New York. Mr. Paul Anthony who succeeded Mr. Dunbar is now out of the country and I am, in his absence, replying to your letter.

Attached for your information are our 1966 audit, 1967 budget, a board list which lists our controlling members, officers and members of our Executive Committee, a 1966 program report. On a separate sheet I have answered item #5 by listing the dates of our Executive Committee meetings and Annual Meeting in 1966. I have also attached, in answer to item #7, a typical form letter used in soliciting funds from foundations.

If additional information should be needed please let us know.

Dear Dr. Fleming:

The National Manpower Council is now engaged in a study of "The Waste of Manpower," its sixth major study. You are, of course, familiar with the Council and its work, but you will find the enclosed booklet helpful, for it describes its purposes and will bring you up to date on its publications.

The purpose of this letter is to invite you to attend the East Coast Regional conference for "The Waste of Manpower" study which the Council is holding on October 9-10 in New York City.

We hope to bring to this working conference twenty to twenty-five participants from the East Coast region who can provide information about and insight into the central concern of the present study--that is, the failure to develop or utilize the manpower potential of various groups in the population. Among these groups are racial, ethnic, and other minorities; older persons (both in and outside the labor force); migrant workers and their children; functional illiterates; and persons with physical and related disabilities.

Waste of manpower, obviously, can occur for many reasons, including poor preparation for work as a result of educational, training, or other deficiencies; lack of opportunities to develop skills on the job; employment in jobs which do not effectively utilize developed skills; and restrictions on opportunities for employment or training which are based on irrelevant considerations. The conference is designed to illuminate these and other sources of waste and the ways of reducing or preventing manpower waste.

The conference will be held at the St. Regis Hotel, 55th Street and Fifth Avenue, New York City, and will begin with luncheon on October 9. Afternoon and evening sessions are scheduled for that day, and there will be morning and afternoon sessions on the 10th, with the conference closing at about 4:30 pm.

The National Manpower Council will, of course, cover the travel, hotel, and other expenses incurred by the conference participants.

I hope very much that you can attend the conference and in that way contribute to the Council's present study. Will you be good enough to let me know as promptly as you can whether we can count upon you to participate in the conference.

I look forward to hearing from you shortly.

Sincerely,

Henry David

NATIONAL MANPOWER COUNCIL

"The Waste of Manpower"

Eastern Regional Working Conference

St. Regis Hotel
New York City
October 9-10, 1959

AGENDA

The National Manpower Council is currently engaged in a study called "The Waste of Manpower." The failure to develop or to utilize the manpower potential of various groups in the population is the central concern of this study. Waste of manpower can occur for many reasons, including poor preparation for work as a result of educational, training, or other deficiencies; lack of opportunities to develop skills on the job; employment in jobs which do not effectively utilize developed skills; and restrictions on opportunities for employment or training which are based on irrelevant considerations. Among the groups being studies from the viewpoint of manpower waste are racial, ethnic, and other minorities, older persons (both within and outside the labor force), migrant workers and their children, functional illiterates, and persons with physical and related disabilities.

- - - - - - - - - - - -

1. How is manpower waste within each of these groups to be identified and measured?

2. What significant changes affecting the members of these groups have recently taken place or are now going on, in terms of preparation for work, the kinds of jobs held, and opportunities for advancement in employment?

3. What are the realistic goals--both immediate and long-range--which can be set with respect to better manpower development and employment opportunities of the members of each of these groups?

4. What are the key problems and difficulties which must be overcome to achieve major gains in the manpower development and utilization of members of these groups?

THE COUNCIL'S PUBLICATIONS

The National Manpower Council publishes the results of its studies, each of which centers on the quality of the nation's manpower—that is, on the training, skills, capacities, and creativeness of the American people.

In each of these volumes there is a Statement by the Council, which presents its major findings and recommendations, and chapters by the Council staff. To date, the following volumes of Council studies have appeared:

STUDENT DEFERMENT AND NATIONAL MANPOWER POLICY. 1952. (out of print)

A POLICY FOR SCIENTIFIC AND PROFESSIONAL MANPOWER. 1953.

A POLICY FOR SKILLED MANPOWER. 1954.

WOMANPOWER. 1957.

The Council also publishes the proceedings of its national conferences which are based on its studies and held at Arden House, the Harriman Campus of Columbia University. To date, the following volumes of proceedings have appeared.

PROCEEDINGS OF A CONFERENCE ON THE UTILIZATION OF SCIENTIFIC AND PROFESSIONAL MANPOWER. 1954. (out of print)

IMPROVING THE WORK SKILLS OF THE NATION. 1955.

WORK IN THE LIVES OF MARRIED WOMEN. 1958.

The Columbia University Press is the publisher for the National Manpower Council.

WORK IN THE LIVES OF MARRIED WOMEN

Seeking to explore further some of the social, economic, psychological, and cultural implications of the revolution in women's employment, the National Manpower Council brought together at a five-day conference over eighty participants from government, industry, labor, education, social welfare, child care, civic organizations, and the churches. Four major themes engaged their attention: the Education, Training and Guidance of Women for Reentry into the Labor Force; the Utilization of Womanpower; the Income Earned by Married Women; and Working Mothers and the Development of Children.

The volume reporting this conference, Work in the Lives of Married Women, deals with the following and other significant questions: Why do married women work? What happens to the income they earn? Does a mother's absence from the home because she is employed jeopardize the healthy development of her children or contribute to juvenile delinquency? Do older women make good workers?

Work in the Lives of Married Women contains the addresses delivered at the conference by Secretary of Labor James P. Mitchell; Katherine Brownell Oettinger, Chief of the Children's Bureau of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare; and Erwin D. Canham, Editor-in-Chief of The Christian Science Monitor and Chairman of the National Manpower Council; five study papers, "The Children of Working Mothers: A Psychiatrist's View," by Leo Bartemeier, M.D., "Supplementary Income Earned by Married Women," by Frances Lomas Feldman, "Utilizing 'Older' Women Workers," by Howard S. Kaltenborn, "Education for Reentry into the Labor Force," by Esther Lloyd-Jones, and "Effects Upon Children of Their Mothers' Outside Employment," by Eleanor E. Maccoby; reports of the conference discussions; and a summary of conference findings by Henry David.

"The prepared papers and summaries of the discussions provide a comprehensive and readable statement of current knowledge and opinion on the questions under study."—American Sociological Review

"This book probes some very important problems which should be carefully considered by anyone responsible for hiring labor. The discussion sections . . . are particularly revealing."—Personnel Journal

220 pages. Cloth $4.75

WOMANPOWER

Since 1890, the number of working women has increased from 4 million to 22 million. Since 1940, the growth of the female labor force has been especially rapid. Today, nearly 30 percent of all the married women in this country hold jobs. More than half of the employed women are married, and almost half of them are more than forty years old. The touchstones of the "revolution" in women's employment are the kinds of work women now do, the kinds of women employed, and their reasons for working. The Council deals with these developments from the viewpoint of the country's total manpower resources and recommends ways of insuring the more effective development and utilization of womanpower.

Twelve chapters by the Council staff cover:

The New Concern with Manpower
Women in the Labor Force Today
Women in Business and Industry: an Employer Appraisal
Trends in the Employment of Women
The Impact of World War II on Women's Employment
The Secondary Education of Girls
Post-High School Education and Training
The Labor Market Behavior of Women
Shortages of Highly Trained Personnel
Women in the Armed Services
Work in the Lives of Women
Public Policy Issues

"Womanpower, by the National Manpower Council, provides a better understanding of women's important role in our economic life. The book presents vividly the nation's present and future need for the skills and talents of women workers. I believe it is a significant contribution which will do much to enlighten all of us on the great economic potential of American women."—James P. Mitchell, Secretary of Labor

"This is a book which will be read time and time again with profit by all who have an interest in the changes in women's employment and in women's maximum success and adjustment to it . . . this many-faceted study is valuable to all students of manpower problems. The work is almost encyclopedic in its coverage. . . ."—Science

IMPROVING THE WORK SKILLS OF THE NATION

This volume reports on the conference attended by sixty-nine representatives from industry, labor, education, the armed services, and government. Following up on A Policy for Skilled Manpower, they considered how the secondary schools, industry, and the community can contribute to the improvement of the nation's work skills. Chapters reporting their discussions illuminate the complex interrelationships involved in the development of skill.

The volume contains in addition the following addresses and papers: "The Problem of Skill Development," by Eli Ginzberg and Henry David; "The Investment in Manpower," by Courtney C. Brown; "Our Secondary Schools and National Manpower Needs," by Clarence Faust; "Vocational Guidance and the Skills of the Work Force," by George B. Baldwin; "Industry's Training Effort in Improving the Work Skills of the Nation," by Karl R. Kunze; "Conservation of Technical Manpower in the Armed Services: A Problem in the Management of Skills," by Edmond H. Leavey, Major General, USA (Ret.); "The Government Stake in Skilled Manpower," by the Honorable James P. Mitchell; "The Community and Secondary Education," by O. H. Roberts, Jr.; "The Placement Function in an Industrial Society: The Unexplored Core of the Manpower Problem," by John J. Corson.

"The conferees performed a valuable service by calling attention to matters that should be considered by persons developing training programs or conducting research studies in this field."—Industrial and Labor Relations Review

"The styles are as varied as the writers, the plot is as simple as civilization's survival, and the literary excellence pops out in much of the writing, which has clarity, punch, and challenge."—The Christian Science Monitor

203 pages. Cloth $3.50, Paper $2.25

A POLICY FOR SKILLED MANPOWER

The American economy, based on a complex and constantly evolving technology, requires ever more and better technical and skilled personnel. This volume provides the first comprehensive evaluation of the critical role played by the nation's nine million skilled workers and technicians, and suggests means for better developing and using its manpower resources in this field.

The Council's Statement recommends ways of strengthening the contribution made by secondary education to the acquisition of skills; developing a more effective program for vocational guidance; providing more equal opportunities for all individuals to acquire skills; improving the facilities and methods used to train skilled and technical personnel; and increasing knowledge about our manpower resources.

Chapters by the Council staff deal with:

Skill and Economic Development
Trends in Skilled and Technical Manpower
Education and Training of Workers: An Employer Appraisal
The Armed Forces and Skilled Manpower
Secondary Education and Preparation for Work Issues in Vocational Education
Types of Vocational Schooling
How Workers Become Skilled Opportunities, Incentives, and the Acquisition of Skill
Vocational Guidance and Counseling
Public Policies and Skilled Manpower

"The book deals with issues and practices in secondary education with a firmness and fairness that are bound to command the respect of the professionals."—Teachers College Record

"The recommendations resulting from the studies deserve careful consideration by leaders in business and industry, and in labor, education and government."—U.S. Quarterly Book Review

". . . a sound and important contribution to the problem of preserving and increasing the manpower resources of the United States. This report is doubly important in that it touches upon fields of education hitherto sadly neglected by our educational institutions."—Technical Education News

PROCEEDINGS OF A CONFERENCE ON THE UTILIZATION OF SCIENTIFIC AND PROFESSIONAL MANPOWER

Sixty-six experts from all parts of the United States met at Arden House to consider ways of making more effective use of scientific and professional personnel. Engineering, medicine, and teaching were the three professional fields upon which the conference centered its attention. These fields are marked by distinctive, if not unique, utilization problems, and the effective use of the personnel in each of them is of critical importance to the nation's well-being.

This volume presents accounts of the authoritative discussions on engineering, medical, and teaching personnel; reports of the discussions of the conference as a whole; and a constructive interpretation of its findings. It makes available the following papers specially prepared for the conference: "Issues in the Utilization of Scientific Manpower," by James D. Zellerbach; "An Economist's View of the Manpower Concept," by Kenneth E. Boulding; "Manpower Utilization from the Point of View of Top Administration," by Frank Pace, Jr.; "Technicians and the Utilization of Professional Manpower," by Seymour L. Wolfbein; "Some Thoughts on the Utilization of Engineers," by George M. Maverick; "Problems and Potentialities of Using Paramedical Personnel to Insure the Most Effective Utilization of Medical Personnel," by Marcus D. Kogel, M.D.; and "More Effective Utilization of Teachers," by Henry Chauncey.

"The report is recommended for the interest of the controversial issues raised for discussion as well as for the practicality of its suggestions and findings."—Science

"Among the significant publications which are emerging from time to time in the field of manpower this volume will undoubtedly find an important place."—American Journal of Physics

"This should be of value to persons in any field, and the six 'major approaches' [to effective utilization] can well form the basis for a sound approach to manpower problems in any field."—The Scientific Monthly

197 pages. Cloth $3.50

A POLICY FOR SCIENTIFIC AND PROFESSIONAL MANPOWER

Recent scientific developments, projected defense requirements, and continuing personnel shortages in certain fields have served to focus the nation's attention on the relatively small but crucial segment of the labor force engaged in scientific and professional work. This volume is a comprehensive evaluation of the role of these five million persons in the economy and of the problems encountered in meeting current and future demands for highly trained personnel.

In its Statement the Council offers recommendations for developing more reliable knowledge about our human resources; for strengthening institutions that educate and train scientists and professionals; for maintaining a continuous flow of students into institutions of higher education; for expanding the opportunities for capable young people to secure advanced training; and for utilizing more effectively the available supply of scientific and professional manpower.

Chapters by the Council staff cover:

The Growth of the Professions
Training and Occupational Distribution
The Potential for Higher Education
Research and Development
The Armed Forces and Highly Trained Manpower
The Nature of Manpower Shortages
The Engineering Profession
Physicists
Teachers
Physicians
Manpower Policies in a Democratic Society

"Although this report is considered by its authors 'to be exploratory rather than definitive,' it is by all odds the most adequate of available sources of data and ideas concerning the intellectual resources of America and their present and potential utilization."—American Scientist

"The book is valuable for the solid research which it reports but is perhaps even more valuable for its success in bringing into focus so many aspects of the manpower problems in science and the professions during fast-changing times."—American Journal of Physics

"Altogether, the book is an able and concise presentation of the most significant problems regarding scientific and specialized personnel."—Monthly Labor Review

263 pages. Cloth $4.50

STUDENT DEFERMENT AND NATIONAL MANPOWER POLICY

The Council's first study examined the student deferment program of the Selective Service System. Together with the Statement and recommendations by the Council, this volume presented essential information on the program, analyzed the military manpower pool and the method of selecting students for deferment, and dealt with deferment for skilled and specialized personnel. It also appraised student deferment policy in the light of democratic values.

The Council's Statements from each of its studies are also published separately. Copies of these Statements reprinted from A POLICY FOR SCIENTIFIC AND PROFESSIONAL MANPOWER, A POLICY FOR SKILLED MANPOWER, and WOMANPOWER, are available upon request from the National Manpower Council.

FORTHCOMING PUBLICATIONS

Government and Manpower, a study of key manpower problems of government in America and of the impact of public policies on the development and utilization of the nation's manpower, will be published in 1959. The proceedings of the Arden House conference based on this study will appear early in 1960.

The Council's study of The Waste of Manpower will be concerned with the nature and extent of manpower waste, the groups most subject to underdevelopment and underutilization, and the kinds of remedial action available.

It will be followed by the Council's final publication, Manpower Policies for a Democratic Society.

Dear Eli:

Here are a few things of ours and others bearing on the economic implications of segregation-desegregation troubles. We feel that a major job of public interpretation of these facts is still to be done.

Also enclosed is an overall report on our program activities this year, which you may find of interest.

I found the recent conference enjoyable and instructive and will hope for an early opportunity for further conversation.

The purpose of this corporation shall be to form and perfect an Association designed to promote cooperation, education and effective employment, education and opportunity for, all people in business, industry and the professions without regard to color, religion, or previous conditions.

ARTICLE IV - DUES & ASSESSMENTS

SECTION 1 - The fees for membership in a Chapter shall be Two Dollars until after the Chapter has been granted a Charter and thereafter may be established by the Chapter By-Law at not less than Two Dollars nor more than Twenty-Five Dollars per year.

SECTION 2 - One Dollar and Fifty cents of the membership dues shall be paid to the National Secretary-Treasurer at the time membership application is reported thereto, of which 50 per cent is to be used for operation expense, publication of periodicals as hereinafter provided, and promotion of the organization of chapters, the other 50 per cent is to go into a Sinking Fund as authorized in Article XVI.

SECTION 3 - The membership dues shall not be less than at the rate of Two Dollars per year.

SECTION 4 - Membership dues are due and payable upon application of membership.

SECTION 5 - Assessments may be levied by the National Executive Board of the National Association in the following manner: The National Executive Board shall have the authority to levy assessments of One Dollar in any one calendar year. If further assessments are deemed necessary by the National Executive Board it shall become mandatory upon them to send a communication to all Chapters stating reasons for the assessments and asking their approval of the assessment. Such assessments shall be levied only when approved in the following manner: Each Chapter shall hold a specially called and duly advertised meeting for the purpose of considering and voting on the assessment. The total number of the members in attendance at all of these meetings shall be computed, and a majority vote of this number shall determine.

SECTION 6 - Assessments are due and payable at such time as set by the National Executive Board. Any member of the Organization failing to pay his assessment within thirty days of the last date said assessment is due and payable shall be delinquent.

ARTICLE V - OFFICERS

SECTION 1 - The National Officers of the Organization shall be a President, Vice-President, and Secretary-Treasurer and Board of Directors not less than five, but may be increased or changed in the manner provided by the General Corporation Act of the State of Arkansas.

ARTICLE VI - DUTIES OF THE NATIONAL PRESIDENT

SECTION 1 - The National President shall preside at the sessions of the Convention in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution. He shall preside at the sessions of the National Executive Board. He shall advance the interests of the Organization.

SECTION 2 - The National President shall execute the instructions of the National Executive Board and have the Organization within the provisions of the Constitution and shall report his acts at the regular meetings of the National Executive Board.

SECTION 3 - The National President shall appoint such Representative as he may deem necessary from time to time, subject to the approval of the National Executive Board.

SECTION 4 - The National President shall have power to withdraw any power delegated to any elected officer when he becomes convinced that the officer has been derelict in his duty or been guilty of a dishonest act.

SECTION 5 - The National President may suspend and remove from the payroll any appointed Representative from his assigned duties for the dereliction in the performance thereof, or for conduct unbecoming a Representative of the Organization, or to conserve the finances of the Organization, subject to the approval of the National Executive Board.

SECTION 6 - The National President may hire such legal, technical, or professional help as is necessary to efficiently operate the departments of the Organization subject to the approval of the National Executive Board.

SECTION 7 - The National President shall by appointment fill all vacancies occuring in the National Office subject to the approval of the National Executive Board.

SECTION 8 - The National President shall have authority to call special meetings of Chapter whenever he deems such meetings to be necessary to protect the interest of its membership after proper notification or consultation with officers of Subordinate Bodies involved. He shall have the authority to delegate such duties to any National Officer or Representative he may name provided such delegation of authority is written signed by him and bears the seal of the National Organization.

SECTION 9 - The National President shall convene regular and special sessions of the National Executive Board whenever necessary.

SECTION 10 - The National President shall devote full time to the affairs of the Organization.

ARTICLE VII - DUTIES OF THE NATIONAL VICE-PRESIDENT

SECTION 1 - The National Vice-President shall perform the duties assigned him by the National President. During the absence of the National President or his inability to act he shall perform the duties of the office of the National President, except that he cannot alter or modify any rules or regulations made by the National President without the approval of the National Executive Board.

SECTION 2 - The National Vice- President shall devote full time to the affairs of the Organization.

ARTICLE VIII - DUTIES OF THE NATIONAL SECRETARY-TREASURER

SECTION 1 - The National Secretary-Treasurer shall attend all sessions of the convention and of the National Executive Board. He shall cause to be recorded the proceedings of the convention and meetings of the National Executive Board. He shall have charge of and preserve all books, documents and effects of the National Office, except such records and documents that properly belong to the office of the National President. He shall issue receipts for all moneys paid to the Organization; pay all bills and current expenses as approved by the National Executive Board. All expenditures shall be paid by checks countersigned by the National President when the latter is satisfied of their correctness. The National Secretary-Treasurer shall keep copies of all important correspondence sent out and received by the National Office and employ together with a detailed statement belonging to the Organization to the National Executive Board.

SECTION 2 - The National Secretary-Treasurer shall be the custodian of the Funds of the Organization and at the direction of the National Executive Board shall deposit all funds of the Organization in some responsible bank or banks. He shall invest all funds in excess of a specified amount to be decided by the National Executive Board with banks giving interest-bearing certificates of deposit or invest such excess in bonds of the United States Government.

SECTION 3 - The National Secretary-Treasurer shall give bond, amount of which shall be determined by the National Executive Board, and paid for by the Organization, to insure the faithful discharge of his duties.

SECTION 4 - The National Secretary-Treasurer shall perform such duties as are herein provided for in this Constitution or may be assigned to him by the National Executive Board.

SECTION 5 - The National Secretary-Treasurer shall keep a complete record of the membership of the Organization. He shall keep a correct record of the members of each Chapter and Regional Organization, and shall make a written report to the National Executive Board quarterly.

SECTION 6 - The National Secretary-Treasurer shall, with the consent of the National Executive Board, employ such assistance as may be necessary to conduct the affairs of his office.

SECTION 7 - The National Secretary-Treasurer shall conduct all correspondence and receive all applications for Charters and Countersign such Charters as are granted by the National Executive Board and signed by the National President.

SECTION 8 - The National Secretary-Treasurer shall at the end of his term of office deliver to his successor in office all books, money, property, papers and other belongings of the Organization in keeping, and his books and affairs shall at all times be open for inspection by the general officers.

SECTION 9 - The National Secretary-Treasurer shall devote full time to the affairs of the Organization.

ARTICLE IX - DUTIES OF THE NATIONAL EXECUTIVE BOARD

SECTION 1 - The National Executive Board shall have power to revoke Charters and to reorganize Subordinate Bodies in one of the two following manners:

A - In case of disputes or conditions within a Subordinate Body that might threaten its existence the National Executive Board by majority vote may reorganize the Subordinate Body by ordering a special election to be held within thirty days after the members in good standing are notified by mail. Under this provision the elected officers of the Subordinate Body shall continue to hold office until the election and may run for election. The National Executive Board may have two representatives to work with the Chapter Election Committee.

B - For violation of this constitution or in case of disputes within any Subordinate Body the welfare of its membership or its existence, the National Executive Board after a hearing, revoke the Charter of suspend any officer or officers from office and take over supervision of the Subordinate Body until its affairs have been properly adjusted. In any case of suspension of officers, an election of new officers shall take place within sixty days from date of order where upon Subordinate Body shall be returned its autonomy under this Constitution.

SECTION 2 - The National Executive Board shall approve all Charters and initial supplies necessary to operate the Subordinate Bodies of the Organization.

SECTION 3 - The National Executive Board shall decide all questions involving the interpretations of the Constitution between conventions.

ARTICLE X - SALARIES AND EXPENSES

SECTION 1 - The salaries of the National President, the National Vice-President, the National Secretary-Treasurer, and the National Membership Directors for the services rendered by each of said Officers during their term of office shall be decided and approved by the National Executive Board.

SECTION 2 - The National President, Vice-President, Secretary-Treasurer and Membership Director shall not serve in any capacity as an officer of any Chapter, Regional Organization, or other Subordinate Body beyond a period of thirty days after having been elected a National Officer of the Organization.

SECTION 3 - All National Executive Board members shall serve under the general direction of the National President subject to the decision of the National Executive Board.

SECTION 4 - The compensation of any member of the Organization performing service under direction of the National Executive Board shall be an amount for the time lost equal to his earning capacity except that this remuneration shall be not less than ten dollars per day or in case of National Representative, Sixty Dollars per week.

SECTION 5 - When any member is required by the Organization to perform services away from his home, he shall be allowed, in addition to the amounts set forth above, first-class transportation fare by the shortest route to and from his destination and actual hotel and incidental expenses, not to exceed ten dollars per day provided that an itemized bill shall in all cases be rendered to the National Secretary-Treasurer.

SECTION 6 - The full-time salaried officers and employees with a year's service in the organization shall be allowed a two weeks vacation with pay, or pay in lieu thereof for each year, but such vacation shall not interrupt the ordinary workings of their office.

ARTICLE XI - OFFICIAL PUBLICATION

SECTION 1 - There shall be published at least once a month by the Organization, a publication designed to educate the membership and acquaint the membership with the activities of the organization. The title of said publication shall be "NATIONAL MINORITIES", or its successor designation, official publication of the organization.

SECTION 2 - "NATIONAL MINORITIES", shall be under the supervision of the National Board of Directors who shall select a Publication Committee consisting of the National President and two members of the National Board of Directors. The Publication Committee shall be directly responsible to the National Board of Directors in carrying out the tash of publishing, "NATIONAL MINORITIES". The Editor of "National Minorities" shall be appointed by the National President, subject to approval of the National Board of Directors. The Editor shall have the power to appoint Associate Editors, subject to the approval of the National Board of Directors to assist him in his work. The Editor shall be paid a fixed sum as set and approved by the National Board of Directors.

SECTION 3 - The National Secretary-Treasurer shall allocate out of each per capita tax paid to the organization twenty-five cents for a subscription fee and this subscription fee shall be placed in a fund to be known as National Minorities Fund.

SECTION 4 - All incomes from advertising in the official publication "NATIONAL MINORITIES" shall be credited to the National Minorities Fund.

SECTION 5 - Mailing cost shall be charged to each Chapter for the number of copies they have sent out.

SECTION 6 - This publication is to be sent through the U. S. Mail to each member of good standing.

SECTION 7 - Price of single copies shall be ten cents per copy.

SECTION 8 - All Chapter publications shall be in conformity with the policies of the organization and must first be authorized by the National Executive Board.

ARTICLE XII - LAWS GOVERNING THE CHAPTERS

SECTION 1 - All subordinate bodies shall submit any and all laws governing said subordinate bodies to the National Secretary-Treasurer for approval by the National Board of Directors.

SECTION 2 -Each subordinate body shall strive to obtain the objectives set forth in this Constitution and maintain free relations with other organizations.

SECTION 3 - Each Chapter shall have the right to make their own Constitution and By-Laws as long as nothing therein is in conflict with the National Policy of the corporation as established by its National Executive Board.

SECTION 4 - Each Chapter shall have the following officers: President, Vice-President, and Secretary-Treasurer.

SECTION 5 - Amendments to the Constitution shall only be made by the National Board of Directors, and shall be by a majority vote of the members thereof.

ARTICLE XIII - DUTIES OF CHAPTER OFFICERS

SECTION 1 - It shall be the duty of the Chapter Recording Secretary or Secretary-Treasurer to keep a correct record of the proceedings of the Chapter, furnish the National Secretary-Treasurer with the names and addresses of all Chapters, read all documents and correspondence to the Chapter membership and keep them on file for future reference.

SECTION 2 - It shall be the duty of the Chapter Financial Secretary to receive all dues, membership fees, assessments, fines and other income of the Chapter, and to give official receipts for same.

SECTION 3 - It shall be the duty of the Chapter Financial Secretary of Secretary-Treasurer to keep a record of all the members, members suspended, expelled, deceased, transferred and reinstated during his term of office, and notify the National Secretary-Treasurer of same, and perform such other duties as the Chapter By-Laws prescribe or the Chapter Executive Board may direct.

SECTION 4 - It shall be the duty of the Chapter Secretary-Treasurer on the demand of the National Secretary-Treasurer to produce his books for examination and audit.

ARTICLE XIV - CHARGES AND TRIALS OF OFFICERS AND MEMBERS

SECTION 1 - Any elected or appointed officer of the organization may be removed from office for any violation of this Constitution or of the By-Laws of the Chapter of which he is an officer, or because of the commission of any act which may be deemed to impair the usefulness of the organization or which is unbecoming to the dignity of his office.

SECTION 2 - All charges brought must be in writing and signed by the accuser and filed with the National Secretary-Treasurer who shall refer such charges to the appropriate Trial Body and shall give notice in writing by registered mail of such charges to the accuser and the defendant and of the time and place of the hearing, which hearing shall be held within one month after the receipt of such charges.

SECTION 3 - By not less than a two-thirds vote of the member of the Trial Committee a National Officer or National Board Member may be reprimanded, fined, suspended, or expelled if found to be guilty of charges filed against him.

SECTION 4 - At no time shall the Trial Committee hear charges with less than four of the National Board members assembled.

SECTION 5 - Any officer or member involved in any case either as an accuser or a defendant shall be disqualified from sitting on the Trial Body in his own case.

ARTICLE XV - APPEALS

SECTION 1 - Any member of the Organization wishing to appeal from the action, decision or penalty must do so in writing within thirty days after the aforesaid action, decision, or penalty, becomes effective.

ARTICLE XVI - FINANCIAL STATUS

SECTION 1 - An advancement of monies up to five thousand dollars, which is the amount to be used in fostering this organization, is to be solicited and made. In consideration of this advancement, The Corporation agrees to repay this advance by setting aside one-half of all memberships received until this amount is repaid in full, plus ten per cent interest, prior to the creation of the "Sinking Fund".

SECTION 2 - The Sinking Fund shall derive as stated in this Constitution, Article IV, Section 2, plus all Donations of any name, nature, or description.

SECTION 3 - The Sinking Fund shall be reserved, to promote cooperation, education, and effective employment, education and opportunity for, all people in business, industry and the professions without regard to color, religion, or previous conditions. This fund must be used exclusively for this purpose and no other; and expenditures from this fund must be approved before payment by a majority of the Board of Directors acting on the recommendation of the majority of an advisory board selected by the various chapter, carried on by a mail ballot.

ARTICLE XVII - INITIATIVE

SECTION 1 - Any alteration, addition to, or amendment of this Constitution of the "NATIONAL MINORITIES ASSOCIATION, INCORPORATED", or any measure or policy may be initiated, adopted, and made effective by a majority written ballot of the members of the organization on a referendum thereon which shall be conducted, and the ballots shall be provided by the National Executive Board upon petition by ten per cent of the members of the organization or upon petition by ten of the chapters of the organization.

ARTICLE XVIII - ELECTION OF OFFICERS

SECTION 1 - All officers shall be elected by ballot at the annual meeting of the Board of Directors and shall assume office at the close of that meeting.

SECTION 2 - No member shall be eligible to office who has not been a member of the organization for one year.

SECTION 3 - No member shall hold the same office more than twice in succession, and filling an unexpired term shall, in this regard, be considered as a term in office.

SECTION 4 - Should an officer resign during the organization year, the President shall appoint some member of the organization to assume the office temporarily, and order the Secretary to send notice of a special election at a special meeting, when the vacancy can be filled.

AIR MAIL SPECIAL DELIVERY

Dr. Ira deA. Reid, Director
Department of Social Studies
Atlanta University
Atlanta, Georgia

My dear Dr. Reid:

Of vital interest to the National Nursing Council for War Service is the matter of improving and increasing educational facilities for the education of Negro nurses.

Because of this, we are arranging a conference at Dillard University December 1st and 2nd for the purpose of bringing educators, vocational counselors, and a few nursing educators together to discuss such points as: basic philosophies of education which should guide the educational approach to nursing; the use of existing college facilities to improve the status of nurses; the need for collegiate schools of nursing for Negro nurses; and the recruiting of college-trained women for the nursing profession.

Already knowing your interest in the conference of Higher Education for Negro Women, it would be highly desirable to have you attend this conference to participate in our deliberations. The conference will be kept on an informal basis with ample time for discussions on roundtables. If you can not use your own travel fund for your expenses, we can provide same for you.

I regret the lateness in writing you, but there have been some minor complications which retarded the planning of the conference somewhat. Will you be kind enough to wire me your reply?

Sincerely yours,

Estelle Massey Riddle

Dear Miss Riddle:

Dr. Ira Reid has asked that I write and thank you for your letter of February 7 suggesting a cursory survey of the nursing situation in this community as a project for social studies students. His reaction to this suggestion is very favorable. He would like to see such a survey for the whole South.

Will you have the Nursing Information Bureau send the pertinent information to us at this address? The April issue of the Southern Frontier, monthly publication of the Southern Regional Council, is to be devoted to "Health". The material be useful to us, too, in working up this issue.

Cordially yours,

(MRS. PHILIP C. JAY, JR)

My dear Dr. Reid:

President Roosevelt's recent proposal to draft nurses brought to a focus the urgency of the nursing situation in relation to military needs. The National Nursing Council for War Service, representing ten national nursing bodies, the International Council of Nurses, and the American Hospital Association, has been publicizing and stressing the need for more nurses for the military and civilian areas since the beginning of the war.

The Council, from its inception, faced its responsibility for integrating the Negro nurse into the total war program. While considerable gains have been made, there is still great need for more active community concern relative to the nursing needs of the Negro people and ways by which these needs can be met now and in the peace years.

Because of this, I am writing to further solicit your cooperation in making your community more aware of its nursing assets, potentialities and liabilities.

We think the Negro Health Week observance in April might be an excellent time to concentrate on the nursing situation. I am writing, therefore, to suggest a cursory survey of the nursing situation in your community as a project for some of your students majoring in the social studies, the report of same to be given and publicized during Negro Health Week. Material is available in the Nursing Information Bureau, 1790 Broadway, New York City, giving ratio of hospital beds and nurses needed according to the population. Figures are also available to estimate needs in certain specialized areas as tuberculosis, cancer, etc. The increased demands for maternity care and the venereal disease control programs are aspects of nursing care on which a greater amount of concentration is needed.

May I have your reaction to this suggestion.

Very favorable

With thanks for your interest and cooperation, I am

Very Sincerely yours,

My dear Mrs. Jay:

Please pardon my delay in responding to your letter of February 12th. The hearings on the Nurse Draft Bill have taken the time of so many of the officials in the Nursing Information Bureau, it was not possible to compile a reference list before this week.

Please be assured that we are highly pleased that the Southern Regional Council is interested in undertaking such a project. I am sure it will bring to the forefront many of the basic problems of that area, and will project certain approaches, in keeping with the proposed plans for post-war health programs.

I am sending you a copy of "Facts About Nursing" and "Schedule for a Survey of Community Nursing Service." The American Journal of Nursing should be available in the nursing school libraries, if not in your public library.

Nurses Must Face Their Social Responsibilities

By ESTELLE MASSEY RIDDLE, R.N.

NURSING is confused." This statement is being made by nurses themselves, as well as by friends and consumers of nursing. Although it may offer some solace to realize that, in the world today, nursing has plenty of company in this State of Confusion, the situation is challenging rather than disheartening. The fact that world confusion throws the nursing profession into a tailspin is left-handed evidence of the vital role nursing plays in the whole social structure.

World War II brought a challenge to service which nurses met steadfastly. Unprecedented publicity was given Army and Navy Nurses, the U. S. Cadet Nurse Corps and, to lesser degree, nurses in civilian services. As a result, the consumer public gained new understanding of problems which may (or may not) be inherent in the nursing profession, but which nevertheless confuse and baffle nurses. At the same time, nurses broadened their horizons, and see more clearly than ever before the relationships between such factors as prices, wages, housing, international trade, etc., and the lives of people they serve, as well as their own.

Will this improved relationship between the nursing profession and the public continue now that the war is over? Will public interest in finding out why so many of the nursing schools are inadequate, and the reason for nurse shortages persist? Will those who volunteered for hospital duty interpret to the public the tremendous amount of teamwork necessary to give adequate nursing care? Will they remember that when the team is short, nurses, who are always on hand, "carry the ball" for the absent members? Will widespread application of discoveries in preventive medicine be delayed because we have too few nurses to carry on the educational program which must accompany every new medical and scientific discovery?

These and many other pertinent questions could be raised to emphasize the need for strengthening the links between nursing and its public rather than letting them rust away. For instance, take the nurse shortage, which is largely due to the public's increased use of hospitals through insurance plans, and because of better wages and education. Sixteen million people are receiving hospital benefits through the Blue Cross Plan alone. Is the nurse alert to the total implications of this new trend, or is she merely critical of the increased responsibility which she must assume?

Is she herself a beneficiary of group plans for health care? Are the patients well nursed? Is there convalescent care?

What about the people who cannot afford to pay anything? One-third of the families in the United States during normal periods have incomes so low that they cannot pay even the average cost of medical care, which is estimated to be twenty to thirty dollars per person per year. This group includes the large number of families whose annual incomes are under $1500.

President Truman's special message to Congress on November 19, 1945, included this statement: "A large portion of the population receives insufficient and inadequate medical care, chiefly because persons are unable to pay the costs of services on an individual payment basis when they are needed, or because the services are not available. In the past, the benefits of modern medical science have not been enjoyed by our citizens with any degree of equality. Nor are they today. Nor will they be in the future unless government is bold enough to do something about it. People with low or moderate incomes do not get the same medical attention as those with high incomes. The poor have more sickness, but they get less medical care. People who live in rural areas do not get the same amount or quality of medical attention as those who live in our cities."

The lower half of our people, whose sickness rates are highest, actually receive only 36% of the medical care, 67% of the hospital care and 18% of the dental care which they need. Inevitably, in the midst of these problems, nurses are in a unique position to interpret to the public their urgency, especially now that the public is sympathetically inclined toward the nurse. The responsibility of the nurse as a citizen cannot be over-stressed during these times.

Nurses who see at first hand that segment of our population which is ill-housed, ill-clothed and ill-fed have a social responsibility to work with other groups for the eradication of the causes of these social ills. While seeming to affect only certain sections of a community, social ills are a threat to every citizen of the community, and eventually become the millstone around the neck of the nation.

Our war experiences, plus the coming demands of a growing national health program, point inexorably to a re-evaluation of the roles played by every individual needed to give the community adequate nursing service. The professional nurse must not limit her thinking to her place alone, as the place of the practical nurse, the nurse's aide and the hospital volunteer must be considered. They have become well known—and in many cases well beloved—by the community. The professional nurse has had to assume greater responsibilities due to advances in preventive and curative medicine and the shortage of doctors. Many of her former functions, such as making empty beds and other simple procedures, have been performed by auxiliary workers. Has she welcomed the other groups which, of necessity, are filling in the gaps of community nursing service? Or does she consider the coming-of-age of these auxiliary personnel as a threat to her professional status?

ALLONS—

In many states, efforts to license those auxiliary workers who nurse for hire have been blocked with the help of professional nurses through lobbying and political pressure. Since we can wave no magic wand and remove all the auxiliary nursing groups, what methods can be devised for meeting the situation realistically? How can improvement in preparation and service of the auxiliary workers be effected if no controls are established? Will the community continue its support of professional nursing if professional nurses fail to give leadership and support to issues which affect the community health?

Nurses, on the whole, are interested in their professional organizations. An editorial in the American Journal of Nursing, December, 1945, states: "State Associations lost no time in arranging for fall meetings when travel restrictions were removed. They are well aware of the unrest among nurses, the urgency of their need for leadership, and the necessity for constructive action. They report excellent and more general discussion of important matters than has been customary." Do these "important matters" include matters of concern to the public, as well as to the nurse? From Bernays' article, "Opinion Molders Appraise Nursing," (American Journal of Nursing, December, 1945, p. 1011) comes a significant statement: "One-third of our respondents came out strongly for public relations activities of the nursing profession, aimed at building up popular acceptance of the functions and duties of professional nurses and developing better understanding between nurses and public. While public relations will have an important part in bringing adjustments in this field, it can only indirectly affect the economic factors. These must be dealt with by the nursing profession, as part of the broad social and economic picture of health care for America."

It is in this "broad social and economic" area that the nurse needs to be activated. Bernays states that leaders are very positive about the excellent work of the nursing profession in the Army and Navy. Will the nursing profession be equally responsive to the call for maintaining peace? Many nurses who will give service to patients irrespective of race, color or creed will refuse to employ or work with nurses of a different race, color or creed. The individual anti-Semitic, anti-Negro and anti-Catholic attitude, multiplied by the number who foster such bias, constitute a grave deterrent to the cause of peace. Will the nurses who have witnessed the tragic loss and maiming of lives in battle sit quietly as flames for another war are fanned?

Women's organizations are pressing now for the appointment of women by the State Department to important World Conferences, which are being called or are in process of formation. Will Nursing have representation in any of these conferences dealing with the fundamental problems of people: health, housing, economics, politics, etc.? Are the nursing organizations giving support to the women's organizations which are pushing for measures of general benefit to the public? The "One World" emphasis must be reflected by nurses as well as other citizens.

As nursing seeks public support for nursing education we should remind ourselves that the ultimate justification which nursing schools can offer for their continued existence and public support is a product which is making a more effective adjustment to present life situations because of the kind of education received.

But neither the schools nor the public can make an intelligent appraisal of the matter without knowledge of what graduates and former students do and how they do it, and the relation of their post-school activities to their school experience, and the degree to which they function as citizens in the community.

The fact that the National Nursing Planning Committee has launched a "Comprehensive Plan for Nation-Wide Action in the Field of Nursing" which points to the necessity for an appraisal of our nursing schools and their products, indicates the concern of nurses about these problems. The extent to which results of the studies will lead to action will depend largely on the philosophy of the nurses themselves and their effectiveness in soliciting and using community support.

Nursing is essential to the community. It has been demonstrated in other fields that community response is forthcoming when proper motivation is crystallized into dynamic programs of action. Ours is the great moment and opportunity to gear the profession of nursing to the accelerated tempo of our communities and our world. We must meet the new challenges as courageously and forthrightly as nurses have met the great challenges of the past.

My dear Mr. Johnson:

In response to your request of September 27th I am sending you under separate cover twenty-five (25) copies of the reprint "The Trained and Hospital Review" entitled "Community Support and the R. N." written by Mrs. Riddle.

Mrs. Riddle, who is away from the office at the present time, is very pleased to know that you have found such good use for the reprint.

Sincerely yours,

Miss Catherine L. Sharpe
State Teachers College
Elizabeth City, North Carolina

Dear Miss Sharpe:

I am just in from a ten-day trip which covered many miles and took me to Florida and Mississippi. I wish I could tell you some of the interesting things that are occurring in this region. At some time I may have the opportunity to do so.

As I recall, you at one time attended a meeting of a business organization in Philadelphia or New York. I have been trying to locate the offices of this organization in order to get a list of their members. I wrote to Mrs. Ruth Handy, President of the National Association of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, 2103 Amsterdam Avenue, New York, but the letter was returned. I am therefore unable to get any information about this organization.

Would you be kind enough to tell me whether or not this is the same group to which you belong? If not, please send me the name of the secretary of your organization.

I trust that all goes well with you and State Teachers College. With kindest good wishes to everybody there in the office, I remain

Dear Mr. Campbell:

I had hoped ere this to see you personally. It seems, however, that my work has not brought me the opportunity to visit Tuskegee yet.

We frequently have literature that would be of interest to leaders in local communities as well as wider areas, and we would be very grateful for a list of the farm agents and home agents in the region under your supervision. You will do us a great service if you will send one of these lists to this office.

Whenever you come to Atlanta, we will consider it a privilege to have you call at 63 Auburn Avenue. I hope at the same time that I shall have the privilege of paying you a visit at Tuskegee.

With kindest good wishes, I remain,

Yours very sincerely,

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

I am very grateful for your letter of February 8 advising me as to the proper source of the list of county agents and home agents. I shall write to these people just as soon as the report of the Southwide Conference comes to my desk.

I really do miss seeing you. I had never thought of leaving North Carolina, but it seems that the call comes to all of us, and here I am in Atlanta.

Whenever I come that way I shall certainly stop and see you, and will expect you to do the same whenever you come here.

With kindest good wishes to you and Mrs. Mitchell, I remain,

Dear Dr. Trigg:

I am sending you a copy of the report of the Southwide Conference held last June in Washington. In the back you will find the names and addresses of those in attendance at this conference who are State supervisors in their respective states.

As indicated in your letter, I think it would be nice for you to contact these leaders directly and ask them to furnish you the names of agents in their territory. This would give you a direct approach to these key people. As you know, Mr. T. M. Campbell is the Field Agent of the lower South with headquarters at Tuskegee Institute, Alabama. If you have not already contacted him it would be an advantage to do so.

You may rest assured that you will be given full cooperation from this office. I shall be visiting your office on my first trip to Atlanta. Should you or Dr. Johnson be coming this way at any time let me know and be sure to come to see us.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mrs. Brown:

From time to time our Council has had friendly contact with your group.

It has occurred to me that the National Council of Negro Women could be mighty helpful in getting some of the pamphlet material of the Southern Regional Council into the hands of people over the South or elsewhere.

Mrs. Bethune knows all about us. I send you a list of our various things. Most of them are timely in just the educational discussion which is going on in the South now. And we are selling them well.

Would Telefact be willing to carry some little reference to the availability of all or certain of these pamphlets?

I send you, in any case, three or four samples of the sort of thing we have. I would be grateful for a letter from you, giving us any ideas on ways in which the Southern Regional Council could become better known and more widely used by your membership.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

My dear Sir:

At the suggestion of Mr. G. D. Rogers, Regional Vice President of the National Negro Business League, it is a pleasure to me to extend to you an invitation to visit our national convention to be held in Tampa, Florida this July 29, 30 and 31st. We would be pleased to have you appear on our program at one of our sessions, and hope that you can find it convenient to accept. We regret that we did not notify you earlier.

Anticipating your presence at our Tampa convention, I am

Yours very truly,

A. G. Gaston, President
National Negro Business League.

FOR RELEASE SUNDAY, MAY 1, 1960

MEMORANDUM TO EDITORS:

The attached Statement on Agricultural Aid for India has been adopted by the Agriculture Committee of the National Planning Association.

The Statement is concerned with the effort of underdeveloped, overpopulated India to produce a better life for its people -- and how the "United States could use its agricultural resources much more effectively than it is now doing to help India achieve a self-generating, advancing economy."

A list of NPA Agriculture Committee members signing the Statement is appended.

AGRICULTURAL AID FOR INDIA

India and China are engaged in an epochal, if not formally declared, contest to see which of these underdeveloped, overpopulated countries can produce the better life for their people -- China under severe Communist discipline, India under free democratic government.

The outcome of this contest may well determine the political development of all of Asia and much of Africa. The importance of this contest to world security is recognized by the American people and by the United States government. In fact, this is one aspect of our foreign policy on which the political parties and all segments of American society are thoroughly agreed.

The United States has supplied and is supplying large amounts of economic aid to India. Nearly one billion dollars worth of farm commodities alone will have been provided under Public Law 480 at the conclusion of shipments under the fourth P.L. 480 agreement signed in November, 1959. Commodities supplied under these agreements have been of great help to India in meeting a tight food situation in the second five-year plan. U.S. private agencies also have shown special interest in the economic progress of India.

The Agriculture Committee of the National Planning Association believes that the United States could use its agricultural resources much more effectively than it is now doing to help India achieve a self-generating, advancing economy. The United States has immense agricultural resources that cannot be efficiently used at home which could be employed in the battle for better diets in India.

If India can break the food barrier to accelerated economic growth, this accomplishment would go far toward winning the cold war for democracy in Asia.

The recommendations made here might well apply to other countries as well. We single out India in this statement as illustrative of a general problem and as a country where we believe the time is right for a massive United States effort in the field of agriculture, for these reasons:

1. The political climate is right.

India welcomes American food aid and technical assistance. In an interview on the TV program, "Face the Nation" (Columbia Broadcasting Company), Prime Minister Nehru of India was asked what kind of economic aid from the U.S. was most useful. He replied that the food provided under Public Law 480 was the most valuable.

The American agricultural exhibit at the World Agricultural Fair in New Delhi has been the "star" exhibit of the Fair. Indians have swarmed into the exhibit to learn more about agricultural methods. They have shown an extraordinary interest in American democracy and the American way of life, wholly aside from technology.

In short, we have established a fine working relationship between our two countries which makes further co-operation relatively easy. It makes sense for the United States to build on this foundation to help India make more rapid economic progress as an example of what can be done under democratic government.

2. The United States has excess agricultural resources.

When President Eisenhower opened the American agriculture exhibit at the New Delhi fair, he said that all nations should join in a "genuinely noble war" against hunger, as a step toward enduring peace. "Men right now possess knowledge and resources," he said, "for a successful world-wide war against hunger -- the sort of war that dignifies and exalts human beings."

The United States has large capacity to wage this kind of war. U.S. weapons for a war on hunger are not merely the vast quantities of grain which can be supplied to other countries needing food. More importantly, we have great capacity to teach others how to produce more food.

Helping the Indians to produce more is far more important than merely supplying them our surplus grains. All we could supply would quickly be eaten up by the rapidly growing Indian population, without lifting diets appreciably.

The United States has a great production-improvement organization, in the Department of Agriculture and the state agricultural colleges. This institution of agricultural research and education has made American agriculture the most productive in the world. It has been developed by public funds, and the public has reaped large returns -- in the form of security against food shortage, the highest quality diet in the world and cheap food prices.

In fact, the researchers and educators have performed so well that farm production right now is advancing at a faster rate than the demand for food, with consequent downward pressure on prices and incomes of farmers. Thus, the United States has surplus capacity in its agricultural industry, including a surplus of new technology.

We could well convert a portion of this research-education institution to work on food production problems for India. This would be an excellent way to wage a war against hunger, as President Eisenhower suggested.

3. These are crucial years for India.

India's third five-year plan ends in 1965-66. During those years the population probably will increase by about 50 million. Food will have to be provided for this growing population, plus an extra amount to provide for increasing consumption per person if economic progress is to be made. Also, India needs to increase output to provide reserves against drought or crop failure for other reasons.

The next five years may be the years that will determine whether democracy will succeed in India. It is fortunate for us that in this period the United States will have large excess supplies of agricultural products, as well as excess supplies of productive agricultural resources which could be devoted to Indian agricultural output.

The NPA Agriculture Committee believes this is the opportune time, therefore, for a major national effort to put India over the hump on food production.

Long-range contracts for supplies of grain from this country should be made as soon as possible, in co-operation with other exporting countries. Our sales of grain to India under Public Law 480 are not as effective in development as they might be if the Indian government had assurance of a minimum quantity for each year of the five-year plan. The United States could easily assure India the amount of wheat it has been getting under P.L. 480 for each of the next 10 years.

Assurance of this imported grain would not slacken the drive for increased food production in India. Shortages and high prices will continue despite these imports. Nevertheless, fears of a lag in the production drive could be dispelled by providing in the same agreement that covers the supply of special food imports, provisions for help on fertilizer plants, enlarged technical assistance, and other programs to increase food production.

Food supplied by the United States can become a major direct investment in Indian economic development, especially of public works. In many projects workers can be paid mostly in food. Accordingly, food can contribute as much as 70 percent of the cost of a road-building project which must be carried on by hand labor methods. In some kinds of factory construction, food may contribute 40 percent of the cost.

These imports should be employed as much as possible to build public works that would yield quick returns in food production. Land and water improvements -- such as terracing, surface drainage, and irrigation wells and tanks -- are examples. This work can be done largely with hand labor.

Technical assistance in agriculture to India should be expanded greatly, with emphasis on teaching the techniques for achieving a combination of improved production practices that will result in really big increases in crop yields. So far, the emphasis has been on chemical fertilizer and improved seed. Now we should push ahead on soil and water management, insect control, weed control, and engineering -- in combination with fertilizer and better seed.

The United States should encourage, by loans and other means, the construction of large new chemical fertilizer plants. Because of the scarcity of foreign exchange, there is great advantage in importing materials to build plants rather than furnishing the nitrogen fertilizer. Indian farmers are now ready to use larger quantities of fertilizer than they can obtain.

Many of our land grant college experiment stations could make analyses to demonstrate the value of fertilizer and other materials under Indian conditions. And we must stand ready to provide enough supplies of fertilizer, pesticides, seeds, etc. for training purposes.

In this war against hunger, we have the greatest resources of any country in the world, far more than our rivals in the Soviet Union.

To use these resources most effectively, we should make an all-out food drive in India -- a critical country, facing a critical competition, in a critical period of its political and economic development.

Footnote by Frank App: I fully agree with the statement pertaining to "Agricultural Aid for India." However, I do not think it is diplomatic or desirable to state that India may be the keystone for winning the cold war for democracy in Asia. India does not consider she is in a struggle for winning a cold war.

The under-developed nations of the world are no longer satisfied to live as they have in the past. The most important thing for these under-developed nations is to have able, progressive leadership which must be established along with such other aid as may be essential. However, unless we can assist in establishing leadership, our material aid will be too limited in the contribution it should make.

Footnote by Ralph S. Yohe: Democracy in Asia is under fire. This report deals with the great importance of India in this struggle. It should not be interpreted to mean that we should be less concerned with the development of democracy, or economic advancement in other under-developed countries. Or that we believe that India is the only critical area in Asia or the rest of the world.

Although the "past quarter century has been a period of substantial trade liberalization" in the policies of the United States and Canada, "the movement towards trade liberalization has evidently lost momentum during recent years," according to a statement of the Canadian-American Committee released today.

The Committee, in releasing its latest report, Changes in Trade Restrictions between Canada and the United States, points out that "in a number of instances some new barriers have been imposed." However, the report asserts, "such recent trimmings have not...seriously undermined a quarter of a century of progress in Canadian-American trade relations. Five trade agreements, substantial declines in tariff levels, and joint leadership in the creation and development of GATT (the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) are solid achievements."

Authors of the study are Constant Southworth of Washington, recently retired after 20 years of service relating to Canadian-U.S. economic relations in the U. S. Department of State, and W. W. Buchanan of Ottawa, a former member of the Tariff Board of Canada, It is the eighth in a series of studies on Canadian-

U.S. economic relations sponsored by the Canadian-American Committee, established three years ago by the National Planning Association and the Private Planning Association of Canada.

The report shows that the over-all level of both U. S. and Canadian tariffs has dropped substantially over the past three decades, with the decline in the United States apparently being sharper than that in Canada. Liberalizing measures regarding valuation procedures were also taken during this period. Such easing of restrictions was, the Committee states, "a significant contributing factor to the very large expansion in Canadian-American trade."

However, the study warns, since 1951 both countries have retreated slightly by taking restrictive steps. The United States has established import quotas on certain products and both countries have increased certain duties and re-established wide discretionary powers and arbitrary valuation procedures.

As instances of such action, the report points out that U. S. quotas established on dairy products in the early 1950s brought repeated declarations by the members of GATT that the United States was nullifying its agreements. The United States has also imposed quotas on wheat and wheat flour, lead and zinc, and red-cedar shingles, commodities of importance to Canada.

In 1958, the United States broadened the President's authority "to increase duties in escape-clause actions" taken under legislation authorizing the reimposition of restrictions when, following a duty concession on any product in a trade agreement, imports should increase to such an extent as to cause or threaten serious injury to a domestic industry. The report points out that in a few cases these increases could be substantial -- in one extreme case as much as 2,300 percent.

Canada has taken restrictive steps "as regards both criteria for customs valuation and rates of duty," the report adds. In 1953, for example, new legislation permitted arbitrary valuation of imports at a higher level than prices in the country of origin. Similarly, a 1958 amendment to the Canadian Customs Act, the study points out, reintroduces the principle of cost of production as a possible criterion of customs valuation and "confers far-reaching discretionary powers on the customs officials in the use of this formula."

Such "arbitrary valuation of imports for assessing ad valorem duties can sometimes be as effective an obstacle to trade as the duties themselves," assert the authors. "Where the values established for the purpose of assessing duties are arbitrary or incalculable, it becomes impossible for the trader to foresee the amount of duty which will actually be assessed."

Nevertheless, they find, discretionary powers have been used with restraint on both sides of the border. They commend President Eisenhower and the U.S. Tariff Commission for "considerable restraint in carrying out the roles bestowed upon them by Congress in administering the escape clause," and point out that of 85 escape-clause cases completed during the last six months of the Truman Administration and the first seven years of Eisenhower's only 12 have resulted in restrictive action by the President.

In Canada, the report sees "little actual change" in the administration of the Customs Act despite the revised valuation procedures. However, the authors believe that the new provisions "could have mischievous effects should a recession of any severity occur while they remain on the statute books."

The report also notes that:

* Canada's tariff level has not fluctuated greatly over the past century, but that of the United States has varied widely;

* Since 1947, tariff changes have been negotiated multilaterally rather than by unilateral action. However, Canada's frequent rulings on goods "of a class or kind made in Canada" have in effect raised certain duties; and,

* Canadian negotiators have more discretionary authority in working out agreements than have their U. S. counterparts.

The Canadian-American Committee is composed of 60 leaders of business, labor, agriculture, and the professions in both the United States and Canada. In studying the various aspects of Canadian-American relations, the Committee tries not only to create a better understanding of problems which have arisen or may arise, but also to develop solutions in the mutual interests of both countries.

THE COMMITTEE ON SOUTHERN DEVELOPMENT

THE NATIONAL PLANNING ASSOCIATION

THE COMMITTEE ON SOUTHERN DEVELOPMENT

The South has made remarkable economic progress in the last quarter century. It has begun to develop a balanced industrial and agricultural economy, greatly expanding its physical output, increasing its efficiency, and improving its income. However, the South's rapid gains have also brought problems of adjustment — and the region still has a long way to go to achieve economic parity with the rest of the nation. A considerable effort is needed to insure continued economic growth in the South and to make certain that this growth is orderly and beneficial.

The Committee on Southern Development is dedicated to this effort. It is a Committee of Southern leaders living and working in the South, organized to promote the orderly economic development of the South by ascertaining the facts, by accurate research, and by issuing policy recommendations to aid in the solution of Southern problems. It operates as a regional Committee of the National Planning Association, making its own reports and policy conclusions. Like the NPA, the Committee represents the three major economic groups — agriculture, business and labor — as well as the professions.

Rapid industrialization and new developments in agriculture are bringing many changes, and many problems, to the South. The South now appears on the verge of making a definite break with its past. But what of its future?

Will the South have a well-balanced economic growth or will over-specialization make its economy vulnerable to the swings of the business cycle?

Will the Southern industrial economy have a reasonably efficient regional integration, or will its industries be mostly unrelated branch plants? Will productivity in the older Southern plants keep pace with the productivity of the newer industries? Will the resources of the South, such as timber, be used up without proper conservation, leaving ghost areas behind?

Will the new Southern industrial economy develop concentrations so dense that they will become miserably congested, or will the benefits of economic growth be spread more evenly throughout the South? Will the South's rapidly growing urban centers soon look like their slum-ridden, inefficient northern counterparts, or will an urban structure be built more in keeping with the Southern tradition?

Where will the labor supply for this growing Southern economy come from when the remaining reservoirs of underemployed farm labor are exhausted? Are Southern educational institutions equipped to provide the kind of managerial and technical leadership required to hold the pace of Southern economic development? Is the South developing the needed number of business entrepreneurs?

Will Southern agriculture be able to develop larger, more highly mechanized farms which can provide the family living on each farm a considerably higher standard of living? Will growing Southern capital resources be used to give Southerners greater control of their economy, or will the South continue to leave the management of much of its capital to outsiders, and depend on outside capital to finance most of its economic growth?

The Committee will study the problems of Southern economic development that lie ahead, will report on them to the people of the South, and to the nation. It will utilize research on these problems undertaken in Southern institutions, supplementing this, where necessary, by its own research. The recommendations of the Committee will bear the imprint of Southern leaders, who look carefully, but with the wisdom of practical experience, at the careful research and analysis undertaken by the experts. The Committee will concentrate its work on those aspects of Southern development where assistance can best be given to advance such development and to lessen the problems it causes. With this object in view, the Committee has established subcommittees on:

—Private and public assistance to local planning

—Education

—Rural migration to industry

—Social environment for economic development

Since beginning its operations early in 1956 the Committee has selected the following specific projects to initiate its work:

1. An analysis of the trends of industrial location in the South since the war — geographical distribution, type of industry, size and labor force requirements.

2. A study of the types of private and public assistance needed to improve local planning. This study includes:

   —a case study of a successful program of local assistance provided by a Southern state planning board.

   —a study of aid to a small town through intelligent planning by a private company.

   —a study of successful local planning in one or more metropolitan areas.

   —case studies of citizen improvement associations.

   —case studies of rural development programs.

3. An examination of future labor requirements for Southern industry—by skills and areas—and of the sources of labor available. This includes study of population growth, age distribution of the population, labor force participation ratio, and migration from the South.

4. A study of the steps to be taken to expedite the movement of underemployed farm labor to Southern industry.

5. An analysis of the kind of economy that the South is in process of establishing: its relation to the national and international economies, regional trade and growth trends, financial and managerial requirements, and the problems which need to be solved to assure its stable, balanced and sustained growth.

The National Planning Association is a private, non-profit, nonpolitical organization of American citizens, devoted to the development of programs and policies which are in the public interest. NPA is not a government agency. It is the only research organization representing all the elements of our private enterprise economy — Agriculture, Business, Labor, and the Professions. It achieves the cooperation of each of these groups in making studies which benefit all of them. NPA believes that through effective private planning we can avoid a "planned economy".

Dear Friend:

Through the courtesy of my good friend, Jack McMichael, a member of our General Executive Board, who gave me your name and address, I am able to write you that a Southern Organizing Committee is now helping set up a regional program for the Religion and Labor Foundation. Our regional office is at the above Atlanta address.

Our first objective is a Southern Religion and Labor Conference in Atlan January 28-29, 1947, at which we expect at least 300 delegates coming from the different religious denominations and branches of the labor movement. In preparation for our conference we are hoping to have as many Religion-Labor fellowship meetings in the local community, as possible, where clergymen and labor representatives will become acquainted and plan to send delegates to Atlanta. If you care to have a speaker for a meeting at any time before the conference, kindly let me know. We earnestly invite you to attend the conference and to help us in making the preparations.

The Inclosed materials will tell you more about the general aims and activities of the Foundation.

Hoping to hear from you, I am

Sincerely yours,

Willard Uphaus

DOOM OR DAWN IN THE SOUTH?

By Rev. T. B. Cowan

Chairman of the Fellowship of Southern Churchmen Minister of the People's Church, Lexington, Ky.

THE FELLOWSHIP OF SOUTHERN CHURCHMEN is an interdenominational and interracial movement of Christian men and women across the South who are concerned to apply the resources of their Christian faith to the critical and complex problems affecting the welfare of our land and its people. More specifically, its purpose is:

. . . to provide creative fellowship for all Christians who are trying to discover and give practical expression to the historic redemptive mission of the Christian faith;

. . . to afford an opportunity through such a fellowship for joint interpretation of the events of the time in the light of the Christian gospel;

. . . to uphold one another in times of stress, hostility, and suffering arising from the devotion of any of the members of God and His Kingdom's cause;

. . . to encourage Christian men and women in the South to unite the redeeming word with the redeeming deed in working for a social order in which the opportunities for the abundant life are most justly and fairly given to the masses of men;

. . . to afford a rallying center for all those whose first loyalty is to our Christian faith and practice rather than to any political or economic creed.

From THE STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

The class structure of Southern churches is becoming more nakedly manifest during the present drive for membership by the two major labor denominations. The upper income churches are in the main bovinely indifferent to Labor's struggle for a place in the South. Some not so high in the ecclesiastical bracket suffer in silence from an uneasy conscience brought on by their written social pronouncements on Labor's right to organize and bargain collectively and their fear to make them known. Some ministers dreading a split in their congregations which have within them members of both competing unions, shy away from the prophetic task of relating eternal truths to events in time lest they be accused of favoring one union over the other. Thus in "the well-to-do" churches the basic issue of justice for all labor in the South is left voiceless or at best prudently whispered. In the lower income sects personal piety is confounded with a pale puritanism and a belief in the other world. Pre-millenial hopes are espoused as the main part of the "old time religion." Here the relevance of other-worldly truths for this worldly living is neglected in a fallible use of the "infallible Book" in the field of predictive prophecy. Ku Klux Klanism flourishes on the fringes of both churches and sects, and the fiery cross, a symbol of anti-Christianity, is diabolically equated with the spirit of the Christian Faith.

The churches in the South are largely dealing timidly with the truth, or wittingly or unwittingly they are evading the timeless relevance of the Gospel to events in time, or they have left this world in cloudy speculations about the next, or they are preaching a personal religion that has a minimum of ethical content and a maximum absence of any social vision. Where ministers have taken their ecclesiastical lives in their hands to herald the prophetic demands of the Divine Justice for all, they have either lost their ecclesiastical status according to cases on record, or they have been warned "to stick to the Gospel, or else. . . ." Ministers who are working with and for unions are troubled about being used as tools and many have left this work with a private smile for the success of the organizing drives. Workers who can take the fate of Labor in the South seriously in their own meetings are loath to hear any pronouncements about it from the pulpit. Some workers are finding the outlet for their desire for fellowship in the unions rather than in the churches.

The gulf between the workers and the churches is being bridged here and there by meetings between workers and ministers. The Fellowship of Southern Churchmen has arranged many such meetings in the years of its history, but it does not have the money to cover the ground or to do the needed evangelism that relates the insights of the Christian Faith to a region that is in bondage to the lords of economic power in the North and the lords of political power in the South.

The Labor leaders who see the place and power of religion in the South are all too few, and the ministers in the South who preach a religion out of this world are far too many. Yet it is the religion out of this world that must redeem the world. Southern fundamentalism has in it the root of the matter which was dug up and discarded by the bright boys of northern religious liberalism. The South has a broken faith—a faith that gives meaning to eternity but no meaning or dignity to life in time. It has confused Biblicism with religion, but never religion with ethicism. It has a religion, but no mighty and deep morality flows from it. If southern fundamentalism could break through its unbiblical use of the Bible and add to its faith in God's sovereignty and Christ's lordship, the passion of the prophets for social justice and Christ's agony for the Kingdom of God, it could herald the Good News that out-revolutionizes all revolutions in effecting radical social changes for the common good.

Hear ye Northern Barons and Southern Bourbons this word of the Lord: "What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" Or, "Whoso shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea." Or this to both capital and labor: "Beware of covetousness."

There might be a sudden emptying of churches under such preaching, but it is more likely that the common people who have seldom heard the word after this fashion would hear it gladly. The clouds we so much dread might break in blessing on the South if the churches would bet their institutional lives on heralding the Divine Justice and the love of God in Christ for every last man, woman, and child of every color, class, and creed. Even Labor itself might come to see the curse of using a divide-and-conquer policy in a much divided area and realize that there is one Divine Justice for all men.

The tidal wave of Labor's organizing in the South is likely to leave its churches higher and drier than they are, unless they get into the fight for justice for the glory of God and the commonweal. Unless they are willing to be damned for the glory of God they are not likely to share in His glory. Unless they repent of the sin of ecclesiastical blamelessness and match this hour with a positive passion for justice, they cannot share the empowerment of Christ's triumphant tragedy. The only kind of goodness that has the ghost of a chance in the South or elsewhere is a militant love of God and His Righteousness before which all men are wrong and by which alone all men can learn to live together in peace.

THE CLERGY OF THE SOUTH LOOKS AT LABOR

By David S. Burgess

Last August as the CIO-AFL organization drive in the South was gaining headway, 25,000 southern clergymen received a letter from the Labor Commission of the Fellowship of Southern Churchmen, reminding them that practically every denomination with churches in the South had endorsed the right of working people to join unions of their own choosing and to bargain collectively through them. At some parsonages, the letter was thrown into the wastebasket with a resounding thud. At other church offices it was lost amid the many special pleading letters for other causes. Some ministers welcomed it and responded sympathetically. But in thirty or more cases, the recipients replied indignantly. Wrote one pastor from Lillington, N. C.

> I regret that so many of our so-called ministers have so far fallen away from their sacred vows to preach the Word as to sell out to such a band of racketeers as the CIO.
> . . . Your racket makes Al Capone look like a peanut pushing chiseler. You come about like the Jews of old and today trying to make (the church) into a den of thieves. . . .

Such pleasantries were, however, paralleled by some positive results. Twenty some churchmen joined the FSC partly because they knew that it stood for labor's right to organize. State directors of the CIO in the South, at the special request of the CIO drive director, Mr. Van Bittner, received the letters. The most important result of the letter was that thousands of ministers were made aware for the first time of the fact that their respective denominations were in sympathy, in word at least, with labor's legitimate aims.

Realistically, however, we must admit that the average southern minister is still woefully uninformed about trade unions, if not actually opposed to their growing power. This fact was reiterated by Cameron Hall, Industrial Secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, who stated after his recent extensive trip throughout the South: "Labor leaders are finding growing difficulty in the opposition to trade unionism as such on the part of too many and too strong religious groups."

This antagonism arises from the fact that southern ministers, like all of us, are affected by the taboos and customs found in the matrix of southern society. Psychologically, many of them are still suffering from the wounds of the Civil War, and as a result their "train of consciousness" works like this: Modernism, Unitarianism—these came from the North and we must fight these imported heresies. Social equality for the Negro—the Northerners who don't ununderstand us or our colored friends down here are trying to jam this down our throats. Factories, big cities, movies, radios, Hollywood, the ways of the world—we must shout against these evils, and call to the mourners' bench prodigals from some northern Babylon. AFL, CIO, John L. Lewis, Communist, Jews, strikes, sit downs, racketeers, bombs—and the heat of righteous indignation is aflame in the clergyman's heart as from the wall he warns his people against the approaching hordes of the northern labor invaders.

The author is minister in the Delmo Homes project, East Prairie, Missouri, and chairman of the Labor Commission of the Fellowship of Southern Churchmen.

The match that lights this flame of indignation is often the clergyman's woeful lack of accurate information about the aims and methods of the American labor movement. For instance, in the opinion of one minister who replied to the FSC labor letter, John L. Lewis is still the head of the CIO, he is still a Communist, and he has always received a fabulous salary unknown even to his closest associates. No doubt the weekly country newspapers of the South contribute to his ignorance, for their financial condition is so precarious that their editors willingly print the free boiler plate anti-labor propaganda supplied so generously by the N.A.M., the Gannett Publishing chain, and the like. Many of the urban publications of the South, such as the "Nashville Banner", likewise keep the Pastors' minds inflamed against the alleged communists and fellow travelers in the labor movement who, in the words of one minister, "are bent on filching every penny from the workingman's pocketbook."

Then turning to the average religious publication, a pastor can find no information about labor, for on this subject there is usually a strict silence. And even the minister who is potentially sympathetic with labor's aims suffers from ignorance. Comments one progressive Florida preacher: "I am not even acquainted with any labor organizer in this state," and yet adds hopefully, "I hope labor will send a well-informed speaker into this state to wake up labor."

Organized labor itself, I feel, must take a part of the blame for the condition of ignorance among the clergy regarding labor questions. When I stated this opinion to a prominent union leader, he replied: "We have found that the average small town minister is opposed to us. We never approach directly on a religious basis, for he would never believe our religious claims about labor being worthy of its hire, principally because some of the organizers are Jews and some others aren't full-fledged, church-attending Christians. We simply ignore the ministers. Instead we explain to the people we are trying to organize that unions aren't going to interfere with their church work, and that unions won't in any way lessen the prestige of their preachers. We talk unionism on a strictly business, bread-and-butter basis. We keep church and union matters separate, and ignore ministers whether or not they attack us.

To me, this is a very unrealistic policy. For southern clergymen, for better or worse, are still among the major moulders of public opinion. Ignoring them will merely create added mistrust in their hearts. Fortunately, such CIO leaders as Miss Lucy Randolph Mason and Mr. John Ramsay, together with certain AFL leaders, such as Broadus Mitchell, have attempted to inform and meet with church leaders over the South in an attempt to educate them. At the same time the more progressive union organizers are appealing to prospective members not only with the argument that unions will raise living standards of working people, but that unions will create a better life for all the members of the community.

Beneath the task of freeing the southern minister of the prejudices of the South and educating him on labor questions is a religious problem stemming from the average pastor's views regarding the church, salvation, and the Holy Bible. For principal objections to the labor letter of the FSC came from those ministers who held the three following positions:

1) The sole duty of the church is to bring men to Christ. Hence it would make no statements regarding any social question, especially if such statements might have political repercussions. Though the definition of a "social question" has been flexible enough for southern churches to make pronouncements on tobacco, liquor, prostitution, and Sunday baseball, and through such pronouncements have affected the fate of politicians, most southern ministers tend to confine their remarks to pleas for better living and to thorough descriptions of the merits of heaven and the curses of hell.

2) It therefore follows that a truly saved Christian is called "out of the world to live unspotted from it. He must observe the Sabbath and keep it holy. He must never visit a "joint", nor be seen near it. He must not "fellowship with unbelievers." He must not join any organization which is dominated by the "unsaved", and as one minister pointed out, "In the case of unions the unsaved may be Jewish organizers from New York or some of the local drunks who may have signed a union card." Rather condescendingly a minister from Asheville, N. C., explains further, "So you can see no real child of God can take the same oath and belong to somethink that drunkards and sinners belong to. As the Bible says, 'Be ye not equally yoked with unbelievers.'"

3) Trade unions bring agitation and confusion, and they prevent a man from living at peace with his neighbor. The theological basis for this counsel of peace at any price is found in the eschatological conclusion typified by Jesus' declaration before Pilate: "My kingdom is not of this world; if it were of this world my servants would fight." (John 18:36). On the surface this appears to be the pacifist position, but such is not the case. It is rather the conviction, robbed of its true eschatological depth, that somehow God can conquer all evil alone and will reward the believer—if not in this life, then in the next. In its more pedestrian form, this counsel of peace results in a blind Pauline acceptance of all authority. "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers" (Romans 13:1), or in the words of John the Baptist to the soldiers, "Be content with your wages." (Luke 3:14). Thus one pastor is led to the conclusion that since a man cannot serve two masters, he cannot serve both the factory boss and union boss; and since the factory boss earns his bread by the sweat of his brow and is a Christian . . ."—I hardly need to complete the argument. Another minister of the Gospel in his reply to the Fellowship declared, "I think the South was doing pretty well by itself until northern labor interests (Communist) took a hand. Since then I have seen no peace." Finally he castigates the Fellowship with the following words: God called his preachers to do right, not to be trouble makers.

Chapel Hill, North Carolina

August 26, 1946

My dear fellow minister:

As you know, workers in the South are awakening to their need for improving living conditions for themselves and their families. This means that they will be exercising their legal rights to organize and bargain collectively in unions of their own choosing.

In this present movement for human rights, the church in the South has an opportunity to do more than it has ever done for the common welfare. For a generation, southern churches in their official statements have upheld the right of labor to organize and bargain collectively. Many Christians have seen in the labor movement an extension of democracy, and a way of life in which individuals have opportunity to achieve the dignity and self respect worthy of the children of God. Our Christian religion is rooted in the Bible message of God, speaking through the prophets for freedom and justice, and His revelation in Christ who came preaching the Gospel of the Kingdom of God on earth.

We confess that the church has too often denied in practice the Divine command to champion the cause of justice and to redeem men and women from exploitation and insecurity. All too often the church's pronouncements on labor have been ideals, rarely translated into practice.

The present hour is so critical that we are forced to face our responsibility by doing the specific things that would help the cause. We would suggest that you bring together your fellow ministers to discuss the meaning of Labor's campaign to your community and to the South. Invite representatives of Labor to explain what the unions' aims are and to explain how you can help. Make the most of Labor Sunday, the first Sunday in September, by arranging a special service and inviting unions to attend. Secure copies of your denominational pronouncements on labor for distribution among members of your congregation. Encourage your young people to discuss labor problems.

If democracy and religious freedom are to survive, we must count on a strong and idealistic labor movement. The best way to insure this kind of movement is for us to work with it in the achievement of its legitimate aims.

Sincerely yours,

David S. Burgess

All of the three positions mentioned above result in the following characterization of the church in the South by a progressive Dixie clergyman:

> The church is an appendage of property and reaction. It is cursed with evangelical fundamentalism, ardent torpor, segregation, poor leadership, social timidity, and a nostalgia for the past which is as gone as it is glamorized. . . . The church suffers from institutional self-centeredness, from its excessive and false individualism growing in part out of frontier conditions; . . . its lack of a sense of human solidarity. . . . ("South Today", Spring, 1945)

At times this characterization of the southern church seems too near to the truth. Yet as one who has been too quick to condemn, I have begun to realize that the southern church has a potential strength which can be used to liberate southern working people from the bonds of ignorance, poverty, and secularism. In fact, it has a strength which the average northern churches—supposedly more advanced—have lacked. Above all, southern churches are much closer to the minds and hearts of their members. The congregation still believes in the Bible; it is less secularized than in the North; and the ministers still command the respect of the average member.

Secondly the southern churches are strong in the right way because the average pulpits are filled by men whose hearts are filled with a very profound sense of modern man's body and soul. Replying to the Fellowship labor letter, one Texas pastor wrote shortly after the defeat of Homer Rainey in the gubernatorial race: "The election shows that this state is in the hands of the rich. This state is being robbed of its rich resources, and labor and the farmers are in very serious conditions as to the standards of living and health." Yet such a pentecostal pastor, after seeing the evil of the world clearly is so overburdened by the bibliolatry of fundamentalism and so dissipated by the emotionalism of his sect that he is powerless to suggest Christian ways of living, within the context of the day, to his poverty-stricken congregation. Yet with all

GEORGIA

The Methodist women of Georgia addressed a statement to each member of the Georgia legislature, denouncing the so-called "right-to-work" bill sponsored by Christian America in Georgia and many other states. Their statement follows:

"We, the Executive Board of the Woman's Society of Christian Service, North Georgia Conference, The Methodist Church, representing 22,000 women, wish to express to you, the lawmakers of our State, our grave concern over several measures you have before you.

"We wish to register our disapproval of the proposed amendment to the Constitution (House Resolution No. 22-114A) so commonly known as the 'Right-to-Work Amendment, but which we consider to be a 'Right-to-Starvation-Wage' Amendment.

"The proposed amendment is one of the first steps in the move to kill the practice of collective bargaining, which practice our Methodist Church supports.

"We believe, should this measure pass, the general public as well as workers will be the losers, because low wages and sweat shop working conditions would unquestionably result, and a condition would be created under which reactionary employers could ruthlessly exploit working men and women.

"We therefore wish to go on record as vigorously opposing House Resolution No. 22-114A."

TENNESSEE

The Farmers Union members in Carroll County eat cornbread from meal ground at their cooperative mill. They also grind their own stock feed, have a cooperative milk testing station, and are making plans for a cooperative cotton gin. Over three hundred families belong to the five Farmers Union locals from which delegates are elected to form the county organization, headed by A. C. Lange. Mr. Lange is also chairman of the Tennessee Farmers Union Organizing Committee. Speaking before a farmers meeting in an adjoining West Tennessee county recently, Lange said, "I'm a plain dirt farmer, but I am giving the next five years of my life to organizing the Farmers Union in Tennessee."

Tom White, a railroad worker from Lexington in the neighboring county, is Lange's most active co-worker. White is an official of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen who was instrumental in getting the Farmers Union started in Carroll County.

The Farmers Union members had an opportunity to show their attitude toward organized labor recently when the progressive mayor of Huntington, county seat of Carroll, backed the building of a shirt factory, the management of which had a closed shop contract with Amalgamated Clothing Workers. The Farmers Union backed the mayor when conservative businessmen tried to stir up the farmers against a union plant.

After working hard all day, Lange often drives to a back-woods school house and patiently outlines the Farmers Union program for working farmers and always has something to say about farmer labor unity. The same can be said for other leaders throughout the state.

"The day has dawned," said State Secretary Homer Crabtree in his Tennessee Union Farmer column, "when the laborer and farmer have awakened to the realization that they are dependent upon one another for prosperity."

NORTH CAROLINA

At the request of five Negro Tobacco Workers Unions, AFL, the Southern School for Workers—organized in 1927 with present headquarters in Richmond—went into Durham, N. C. for a field trip last January. After several days spent in attending union meetings, talking with rank and file members, and meeting with officers and committeemen, plans were laid for a week's series of classes

The program for the week was based entirely on those topics we found were close to the hearts of the union members: How to Use Grievance Procedure, Working on New Contracts, Understanding and Promoting State and National Legislation, and Working with Other Organizations in the Community.

Two of the work campers, Big Lick, Tennessee, 1946.

It was a stiff assignment for a week, but the members tackled the subjects with determination. Coming in from a day's hard work in the tobacco factories, they brought their ideas and questions, and for two and often nearer three hours, the union hall was alive with vigorous discussion. Nor was the week all talk—together plans were devised for further educational work within the unions, and one exciting session was held with a group of ministers to plan "How Labor and the Church Can Work Together in Durham." The night shift workers were determined not to be left out, so for their benefit the same program was carried on every afternoon for the week.

Only a week, but one in which over one hundred and twenty workers from the five unions met to sing, talk, and plan together. So real was their enthusiasm that not even the breakdown of transportation due to a heavy snow storm dampened their desire "to talk union."

For the past three years, the Southern School for Workers has placed its primary emphasis on a field work program, realizing that through work in the local union halls an ever-increasing number of workers can be reached.

LABOR NEWS!

ARKANSAS

Once a month in Little Rock what amounts almost to a miracle in the South takes place at the YMCA here, when church ministers and labor leaders sit down together to have lunch—and to talk. The ministers come from all denominations in the city, the labor men from all the unions in Greater Little Rock. The Ministerial Alliance, formed when two separate groups combined, urges upon the clergy the organization of a local Religion and Labor Foundation to grow out of these informal monthly sessions.

Each meeting is valuable in two ways: first, ministers and labor men are given a chance to meet each other on friendly terms, to talk together as individuals rather than as representatives of groups which are often opposed to one another because of lack of understanding.

Tobacco Workers AF of L Legislative Conference, Richmond.

Second, discussions of issues of equal concern to both groups are held at each meeting, with the problem introduced by either a religion or a labor man, and the floor then opened by discussion from all men present. "A Union Leader Looks at the Church", "A Clergyman Looks at Labor Unions", and "The Southern Cotton Oil and Seed Company Strike Conflict" have been among discussion topics.

Dr. Willard Uphaus of the National Religion and Labor Foundation has visited our group to talk on the role of the clergy and union leaders during the present drive for union organization in the South.

FLORIDA

Vigorous condemnation of the Ku Klux Klan as unAmerican, unChristian, and undemocratic, and vehement denial that the organization represents Protestantism has come from the Ministerial Association of Greater Miami in a statement made following the revival of the Klan in and around the Florida city.

"As ministers of the gospel of Christ," declares the statement from clergymen in Miami and outlying sections, "we not only oppose the position and principles of the Ku Klux Klan, but we also strongly advise our people to have no part in furthering its organization.

"We are not alone opposed to the Ku Klux Klan, but also to the apparent tendency on the part of many people to assume that the Klan is a Protestant organization. . . . We do not consider the Ku Klux Klan as representing Protestant Christianity in any condition or expression, since it is a denial of Christianity itself . . .

"The Ku Klux Klan is the precise denial of everything truly American and democratic."

OUR SPECIAL EDITOR

Miss Nelle Morton, the Special Editor of this issue of Economic Justice, is General Secretary of The Fellowship of Southern Churchmen. Miss Morton is fully fitted by both education and experience to lead a movement like The Fellowship in the South. She was born in the mountains of East Tennessee, where her father was manager of a commissary in a lumber camp. She grew up in Kingsport, where she witnessed the rapid industrial expansion and knows at first hand the resulting problems.

Miss Morton is a graduate of Flora McDonald College, where she was president of the student body. She holds an M. A. in Religious Education from Biblical Seminary of New York. She served as Parish Assistant for four years in Plymouth Congregational Church of the Pilgrims in Brooklyn, where she came into contact with the lower east side of Brooklyn. Before becoming General Secretary of The Fellowship, she was for seven years Associate Director of Young People's Work in the Presbyterian Church in U. S.

We are proud to have had so able an editor assemble the materials in this bulletin. Thousands of copies of the bulletin will be distributed throughout the South as part of the preparation for the Southern Religion and Conference to be held in Atlanta, February 4-5, 1947.

PREACHERS of DISUNITY

By Stetson Kennedy

Some of the very best union organizers in the South are preachers who have taken it upon themselves to promote the social as well as the theological doctrines of Christ.

Virtually every religious group in America has proclaimed the equal right of labor and management to organize freely for collective bargaining.

And yet there are in the South a handful of self-styled Christian preachers who have prostituted their calling by engaging in an un-Christian crusade to keep working people from forming labor unions. A few of these preachers are conscientious but misguided zealots; but most of them have prostituted their profession for money. It should also be said that most of them are of the jackleg itinerant class, without formal affiliation with any organized denomination—although some few belong to what these are wont to call the "highsteeple crowd."

This latter elite segment is diligently cultivated by the National Association of Manufacturers, "a union" of big industrialists representing some $60,000,000,000 in corporate wealth, through its "Committee on Cooperation with the Church." Among N.A.M.'s regional offices are three, situated in Atlanta, Dallas, and St. Louis.

The N.A.M. technique has been described as follows by "The Witness," news magazine of the Episcopal Church: "The National Association of Manufacturers, with plenty of what it takes to do the job, has turned to the task of converting the clergy to its point of view. The stunt is to get some highly respectable parson, innocent to the ways of the N.A.M. to invite the brethren to a nice dinner or luncheon, feed them well, pass out fat cigars, and then turn on the line through a paid employee who generally is a clergyman delighted to be on such a generous payroll."

When the N.A.M. propositioned the Federal Council of Churches—which embraces some 28,00,000 church folk in 24 denominations—about co-sponsoring a series of regional "Church-Industry" conferences, the Council of Churches insisted that representatives of organized labor be invited to participate. The N.A.M. reluctantly agreed to this, but at the same time has gone ahead with other "Church-Industry" conferences wherever it can find local church collaborators who are willing to leave out labor.

When such an affair was arranged in Memphis, the Rev. S. E. Howie, president of the Memphis Ministerial Alliance, berated businessmen for opposing the inclusion of labor representatives. "The church emphasizes human values, and capitalism emphasizes profits," he said, "and between these two emphases there is a fundamental antagonism."

Most of the big N.A.M.'s in the South have a regional outfit of their own, the Southern States Industrial Council. This Council—significantly organized the year Roosevelt took office—has consistently worked against unionism and progress. This year it came out into the open with its campaign against all forms of union security. Like the N.A.M. on a national scale, the Southern State's Industrial Council is doing what it can to convert preachers to anti-unionism.

In a letter to its members dated September 4, 1946, entitled "The Church in the Postwar World," the Council president declared, "I think one of the most vital and pressing questions relating to our future lies in determining the place the Church should have in our plans." Noting that ministers "have the respect and confidence of the people," the Council went on to say: "The businessmen and industrialists of the South have a marvelous opportunity—right here in a region where religion is inherent in the nature of the people. . . ."

Some southern industrialists, like millionaire manufacturer of road-building equipment R. G. LeTourneau, have sought to draw the cloak of religion around their own opposition to unions. LeTourneau, who adopted the notorious Bedeaux speedup system, has claimed God as a co-partner in his enterprises. Every attempt of his workers to organize a union has been beaten back by "preachers" brandishing Bibles.

A prototype of the preachers who have hitched onto the anti-union gravy train is "Parson Jack" Johnston of Columbus, Georgia. Ironically, 'Parson Jack" takes as his text Numbers 10:20—"Come thou with us and we will do thee good." Interestingly, Parson Jack's Tabernacle, as it was named upon its establishment in 1932, was named the Roberts Memorial Baptist Church in honor of Columbus Roberts, who donated the first building, and a year later still another building. The total value of the Tabernacle now is claimed to be $100,000. Roberts is prominent in the Coco-Cola Bottling Company, and has numerous other industrial interests.

"Parson Jack" has been preaching in Columbus since 1930. In 1932 he began to publish a weekly "religious" sheet called The Trumpet, and later an additional weekly paper, The Columbus Tribune. Up until 1945 The Trumpet was published as a monthly religious magazine, but during that year it appeared as a bi-weekly newspaper. In December of 1945 it was decided to change the name of the paper to The Tribune. "A Champion of the People, since the effort was not "religious", primarily, but secular. . . ." and to resume publication of The Trumpet as a special anti-CIO paper.

"Parson Jack" claims that by September of 1946, 14,000 copies of The Trumpet were being distributed weekly, mostly in Georgia. The employees of the following Alabama and Georgia textile mills are positively known to be receiving The Trumpet by mail at their homes, free, without having subscribed or asked for it:

In Georgia: Bibb Manufacturing Company, Swift Manufacturing Company, Swift Spinning Mill, Jordan Manufacturing Company, Eagle and Phenix, Columbus Manufacturing Company, Muscogee Manufacturing Company, Georgia Manfacturing Company, all of Columbus; Bibb Manufacturing Company (Mill No. 1, Mill No. 2, Payne City Mill, Macon and Bibb Shirt Company), Macon Textiles Incorporated, Atlantic Cotton Mill, Willingham Mill, all of Macon.

In Alabama: Avondale Mills, Sylvacauga; Russell Mills, Alexander City; West Point Mills, Lanette; Lanette Bleachery and Dye Works (West Point subsidiary), Lanette; and Gurney Manufacturing Company, Prattville.

It is significant that "Parson Jack's" Tribune has frequently carried "advertisements" of the major textile mills in the Columbus area. For instance, on February 21, 1946, there was a jointly-signed ad reading: "The policy of owners and managers, all responsible Columbus citizens, includes continuous operation, full employment and improvements in every way possible." It was signed by: Bibb Manufacturing Company, Columbus Manufacturing Company, Eagle and Phenix Mills, Georgia Manufacturing Company, Georgia Webbing and Tape Company, Jordan Mills, Inc.; Muscogee Manufacturing Company, Swift Manufacturing Company, and Swift Spinning Mills.

In a letter to someone who contributed one dollar to his "Christian Crusaders League" in September, "Parson Jack" attacked the CIO and said, "We are doing a little of everything to combat their efforts." His letter went on to say: "We are making the fight, or rather, putting on the 'Educational drive,' through the columns of our paper, The Trumpet. Of course, we say some things through the columns of The Tribune also, and certainly it is costing us lots of money. Certainly, we are receiving some assistance, or we would not be able to travel at all. . . ."

The author of this article is a "born" Southerner, whose love for the South drives him to discover truth as revealed in this article and in his recent book, 'Southern Exposure, published by Doubleday & Co., New York, $3.00.

'Parson Jack" continued: "The Mills (textile) are hedged off from helping, on account of the one-sided Wagner Act. . . . They can do but little to help, unless they subject themselves to fines, etc., by the Government. . . . In lieu of the facts mentioned above, if the citizens would 'wake up,' and come to our aid, we would be able to secure lists of workers, and . . . would be able to more effectively combat the situation."

"Parson Jack" offers his booklet, Dangers of the CIO Movement for 30 cents each in lots of 100 or more; Churches Repudiate CIO "Bid for Fellowship" with Them at 20 cents per copy in lots of 50 and up; and It Is Not Too Late at 85 cents each.

Like Militant Truth, "Parson Jack" takes as his text, "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers"; and then he seeks to show that unions are un-Christian. While acknowledging that "some" members of the CIO might be Christians, "Parson Jack" goes on to say, "so long as they remain connected with such men as Jacob S. Potofsky who was elected to take Sidney Hillman's place . . . they could not expect a Christian organization . . . to open her doors and invite them to 'come in and sup with us.' "

While "Parson Jack" spends most of his time fighting the CIO, he frequently attacks other unions as well. For instance, he has objected to the AF of L's encouraging its Negro members to vote, adding, "The AFL should not expect southern people to continue to 'hang on to their coat tail' while they leave the traditions of the southern people." "Parson Jack" has also charged that the 1946 American railroad strike was dictated by Stalin. He has said, "With regret, there is not a chance to answer the question, 'Is the labor movement Christian?' in the affirmative." And he has concluded, "We do not need to organize, but we sorely need to EVANGELIZE."

In an editorial entitled "A Right Ugly Affair," "Parson Jack" sought to blame Governor Ellis Arnall for the quadruple lynching near Monroe in Walton County, and concluded: "The Northern, Communist, Brownish, Brindle kind of looking crowd had better keep their mouths out of some things down here or there will be serious trouble which all of us will regret"

The Tribune went all-out for Talmadge as "The White Hope of Georgia." It was one of the several newspapers in the State which supported Gene. It also came to the defense of the "Grand, High, and Noble principles for which the Knights of the Ku Klux Klan stand," and charged that Northern "Jews and Catholics" were sending out "poison literature" against Talmadge.

A regular contributor to "Parson Jack's" Tribune is one C. G. Rape. One of Rape's semi-literate epistles published by "Parson Jack" said: "Yes, I am an ex-Klansman, and am proud to be a part of the FREEBORN AMERICAN ORGANIZATION, an organization that is composed solely of red-blooded Americans and not Jews, Catholics, and Negroes." He charged that: "The Jews, Catholics, and Negroes . . . have done and are doing all in their power to ruin and to destroy our government" and that "The CIO is one of their agents of destruction."

"Parson Jack" cites as one of his authorities on "subversive activities" Joseph P. Kamp, head of the so-called "Constitutional Educational League." Kamp was executive editor of The Awakener, twice recommended by the Nazis' World Service propaganda bureau. Associate editor of The Awakener was Lawrence Denis, author of The Coming American Fascism.

In his booklet, It Is Not Too Late, "Parson Jack" reprints an article by the Rev. Gerald Winrod, widely known as the "Jayhawk Nazi." Winrod is publisher of The Defender and is under Federal indictment for sedition.

Besides "Parson Jack", there are a handful of other preachers of disunity without papers. One such is the Rev. O. A. Hood, former pastor of the Fire-Baptized Primitive Baptist Church of Athens, Ga. The Rev. Mr. Hood has frequently lent his name as sole signer of anti-union propaganda leaflets distributed to employees of the Athens Manufacturing Company (textiles).

In another Georgia mill village a Holiness preacher in a sworn statement has related how the mill manager "called all of us preachers together and told us we should help keep the mess out—meaning the Union."

The preacher went on to say that the manager "let me go through the mill and shake hands with the help and let me invite them to church." Moreover, the mill manager "put a new roof on the church, paid $300 on the church, paid $250 on the parsonage, and gave me $50 and said to use it the way I wanted to."

And then, of course, the preacher paid off. In this case the mill manager gave him a form letter for resigning from a union, which the preacher took into the homes of the workers and urged them to sign. "I went to see Mrs. Barnwell and told her that it might be some help to her if she signed the form," he said, citing one such call. "Mrs. Barnwell signed the form and I mailed it to the union in Atlanta."

A common defense of mill owners when confronted with charges of subsidizing anti-union preachers (a violation of the National Labor Relations Act) is that the mills have traditionally contributed to the village churches, even when there was no union organizing campaign in progress. But needless to say, the integrity of the church is bound to suffer when subsidized by anti-union industrialists.

The future of the church is inextricably bound up with the material welfare of the people. It must not fail to give full moral support to the principle of collective bargaining through democratic unions.

BEATITUDES

for the

WORLD OF WORK

BLESSED are they who see that the chief end of all work is to glorify God.

BLESSED are they who realize that before God all men are equal, and that all work must be made to yield real equality of opportunity for all.

BLESSED is all work when it is geared not to profits for the few but to a richer quality of life for all.

BLESSED are Management and Labor when they remember they are human beings and that problems of work are problems of human beings and human relations.

BLESSED also are Management and Labor when they make their first task not self-enrichment but service to the Community.

BLESSED are those Businesses and Labor Unions which do not discriminate against others because of color, class, or creed.

BLESSED are all places of work that have needed safety devices and heal thy surroundings.

BLESSED are the employers and employees who realize that a strike by either party is a childish confession of failure rather than the outcome of sincere negotiations by mature minds.

BLESSED are all concerns which make generous provisions for the aged and infirm so that their years of service to the community end not in tragedy.

BLESSED are the Industries and Labor Unions which protect children and youth from being robbed of their school years by forced labor.

BLESSED is the nation whose government, churches and schools, factories and farms are fully employed to meet not only the spiritual and physical needs of its own citizens but helping to free the world from fear and want. Rejoice then and be exceeding glad for the vision of peace through justice draweth nigh.

SYMBOLS

They were symbols
The preacher said—
The bread and wine
In memory of him,
Of Jesus the Toiler . . .

I see other symbols.
Hungry and cold
They tramp America
Like ghosts passing by—
In the coal camps,
Dirty with dust,
Begging a crust,
A nickel, a dime,
Or an old coat
For winter time.

Toilers' children,
Gaunt and tired,
With rickets and flux—
These are symbols I see . . .

VOICE OF THE CRACKER

(To Charlie Gilman)

I'm the voice of The Southern Cracker,
Once silent, inarticulate.
But I'm learning to look
And talk straight now,
Listen to me . . .
For you've listened to others—
Unfriendly voices,
Because I was quiet,
Laboring with arm
And back muscles
Beside the silent slave,
My voice was not heard. . . .

I'm learning that
The blood of my fathers
Made revolution
And hammered beauty
Out of a wilderness,
That America's dirt
Has sucked up my sweat
To keep soft hands soft
And make pot-guts potted
While hunger and rags
Disease and illiteracy
Shriveled the souls
Of my own children . . .
Oh, I'm the Cracker—
The Red-neck
Clod-hopper
Mountain hooger hill-billy—
The "white-trash" nobody.

And you've heard
That I'm a lyncher
Of Negroes,
The man with hood and night shirt!
But I tell you
You've heard falsely!
For the pattern was set
From the big houses
By those who now point
The unfriendly finger at me,
Who taught me to hate
And say "nigger,"
And the Negro to hate
And say "white-trash"
And both of us
To despise the Jew. . . .

Oh, I'm the Cracker,
And I'm learning—
Of unity,
Not hate,—
To look
And talk straight. . . . !

CLODS OF SOUTHERN EARTH:

By Don West

Published by Boni & Gaer N.Y.

$1.00 paper cover, $2.50 cloth.

"You say you want a poem with its roots in the earth; a poem that finds beauty in the lives of common people, and perhaps a poem that may sometimes show the reasons for the heartache and sorrow of the plain folks and sometimes point the way ahead. . . .

"I come from an old southern family. You've heard that one before, yes? Well, I don't mean what you think. Mine is a real old southern family. Oh, I'm no sprig off the decadent tree of some bourbon, aristocratic, blue-blood family of the notorious slave-master tradition. . . . I'm more southern than that. That represents only the small minority. My folks were the men who wore jean pants and the women who wore linsey petticoats. They had nothing to do with the genteel tradition. Some were the first white settlers of Georgia, and some were already settled when the white ones came . . .

"Some Southerners love to boast about their families, and I reckon I do too, a little. At least none of mine ever made his living by driving slaves. There's nary a slave owner up my family tree. The old story that we don't look too closely for fear of finding a "horse thief" is commonplace, of course. Indeed, wouldn't it be shameful to find one of our grandpaws doing such a petty theft? Who could be proud of a great-grand-daddy with ambition no higher than stealing a horse? B'gad, we Americans go in for big stuff! Steal a horse? NO! But steal a continent, a nation; steal the lives and labor of thousands of black men and women in slavery; steal the wages of under-paid workers; steal a railroad, a bank, a million dollars—oh boy, now you're talking! That's the real class. Those are the ancestors America's blue-bloods worship. But steal a horse—aw, heck, the guy might be hanged for that! . . . Do you think I'm telling about this tree just because it's mine? You're partly right. But the main reason is that, to a greater or lesser degree, it represents the great majority of southern whites. And their real story has never yet been adequately told. Some day I intend to do it, to tell about these people with rough hands, big feet, and hard bodies; about the real men and women of the South. . . .

"I love the South. Like hundreds of other southerners, I dislike some things about its customs and ways. But our folks have lived and died there. Our roots are sunk deeply from generations back. . .

"So I pass these poems on to you who may care enough to read them. They are little pieces of life—and death—picked up along the way. May they help to kindle little sparks that will grow into big flames!"

PINEVILLE, KENTUCKY, 1946

(News item: "Twenty-four miners killed by explosion. Company had sent men to work in mine after it was condemned by federal inspectors; twenty bodies sealed in mine.")

Twenty-four miners,
A blast and a boom
Twenty-four bodies
In a drift-mine room.

Some of them Negro,
All of them brave—
No segregation
In this common grave!

Twenty dead miners
In a common tomb—
Shake yourself, mountain,
To give them room.

Twenty together
Is no lonesome road,
Each helps to carry
The other one's load.

The great deep sorrow
For those who died
Cannot be buried
In a mountainside.

Go, America
And bow your head
Where Four Mile Hollow
Has sealed her dead!

CONFERENCE CALL

All over the world today the common man is rising to claim his rightful place in a just and democratic society. The growth of the labor movement out of the needs and aspirations of working men and women in the South is one manfestation of this claim. In the presence of this manifestation a group of religious leaders in the South are recognizing their responsibility and that of the institutions they serve.

We feel that in labor's assertion of its right to organize, religious leaders face an unprecedented opportunity to put into practice their respective faiths, by interpreting labor's struggle in accord with the will of God for a social order of divine justice and an abundant life for all, and by banding together to effect this purpose. At this moment, Religion and Labor definitely have a common responsibility in building the Brotherhood of Man.

We invite you to attend the Southern Religion and Labor Conference at the Butler Street YMCA in Atlanta, February 4-5, 1947, at which churchmen and labor representatives will meet to formulate a program of action.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

RECEIVED
JAN 16 1947
Southern Regional Council

Thirty-two well-known southern religious leaders, belonging to various denominations and faiths, have issued a call for a Southern Religion and Labor Conference to be held in Atlanta, February 4-5.

In inviting interested churchmen and labor representatives to attend, these leaders declared that "The growth of the labor movement out of the needs and aspirations of working men and women in the South" is a manifestation of the fact that "all over the world today the common man is rising to claim his rightful place in a just and democratic society." The call points out, further, that religious leaders now "face an unprecedented opportunity to put into practice their respective faiths, by interpreting labor's struggle in accord with the will of God for a social order of divine justice and an abundant life for all."

The registration of delegates will begin at ten o'clock, Tuesday morning. The opening session at two o'clock the first afternoon will have a panel of four speakers, two representing the church and two representing labor, discuss the topic, "Labor and the Church in the South." The delegates will be greeted by three Atlantans, Dean Raimundo DeOvies of St. Philip's Cathedral, Mr. Henry Chandler, President, Atlanta Federation of Trades, and Mr. Charles Gilman, Georgia CIO Director. Dr. Alva W. Taylor of Nashville, who is General Chairman of the Conference, will preside.

There will be general sessions on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings. On the first evening, the subject, "The Spiritual and Economic Basis of Democracy in the South" will be discussed by Mr. Paul L. Styles, NLRB Regional Director of Atlanta, and Dr. W. H. Borders, Minister, Wheat Street Baptist Church, Atlanta. Dr. Liston Pope, Professor of Social Ethics at Yale University Divinity School, will be the principal speaker at the final Wednesday evening meeting, having as his topic, "The Social Meaning of Religion."

Throughout Wednesday, the second day, the delegates will divide into six workshops to plan programs of study and action on the following subject: 1. The Church, Labor and the Community; 2. The Media of Communication; 3. Economic Restraints on the Church; 4. Youth, Education and Labor; 5. The South as an Economic Dependency; 6. Social and Labor Legislation. In all, fifty speakers and consultants, representing the church, synagogue, labor, education, the press and radio will take part.

The Methodist Federation for Social Service and The Church League for Industrial Democracy (Episcopal) have endorsed the conference, as have also ninety individual leaders residing in different parts of the South.

The thirty-two signers of the Conference Call constitute the Southern Committee of the National Religion and Labor Foundation. They are: Dean Julia F. Allen, Berea, Ky.; Rabbi Isadore Barnett, Savannah; Dr. H. D. Bollinger, Nashville; Dr. William H. Borders, Atlanta; Miss Elizabeth Bowles, Atlanta; Dr. Cleveland J. Bradner, Jr., Danville, Va.; Dean B. R. Brazeal, Atlanta; Rev. David S. Burgess, East Prairie, Mo.; Dr. Edwin L. Clarke, Winter Park, Fla.; Rev. Robert M. Cook, Harriman, Tenn.; Rev. T. B. Cowan, Lexington, Ky.; Rev. Jack A. Davis, Sarasota, Fla.; Prof. Moses N. DeLaney, Raleigh, N. C.; Dr. Witherspoon Dodge, Atlanta,; Rabbi Muir Engel, Greensboro, N. C.; Rabbi Harry H. Epstein, Atlanta,; Bishop W. A. Fountain, Sr., Atlanta,; Rev. Sam F. Freeman, Jr., Little Rock,; Mr. George Harper, Nashville,; Mr. George J. Harrison and Dr. Maynard H. Jackson, Atlanta,; Rev. Dear Conference Delegate:

We inclose herewith a mimeographed report of the findings and recommendations of the workshops adopted by the Southern Religion and Labor Conference. This report is filled with many practical suggestions on church-labor cooperation in the local community. May God bless you as you bring the spirit of our Atlanta fellowship to your friends and organizations.

Will you please write me briefly how you now feel about the Conference? If you believe that there were real values, we hope you will tell us. Such information encourages us to carry on, and it also helps us secure funds for the advancement of the work. In writing, tell us, of course, how we can improve on the Atlanta experience, when we set up the next conference.

You will also find other helpful materials in this packet. We are prepared to fill orders for our new pamphlet, "Trade Unions and Preachers" by Rev. David S. Burgess. Please call on us if we can help you in any way.

With best wishes, I am

Sincerely yours,

Willard Uphaus

SOUTHERN RELIGION AND LABOR CONFERENCE
Butler Street Y. M. C. A., Atlanta
February 4-5, 1947

REPORT OF WORKSHOPS

PREAMBLE

The organization of labor is one of the major humanitarian movements of our time. This movement has much in common with the principles and precepts of Biblical religion. Both demand equity, justice, the rights of the "least of these", the abolition of enforced poverty. Both seek the humanitarian organization of society, including the economic system, in terms of Brotherhood, the National Religion and Labor Foundation exists to promote these ends.

WORKSHOP I

THE CHURCH, LABOR, AND THE COMMUNITY

Historically, both the church and the labor movement have come into being in working-class communities, and in general, movements of reform and revolution, which have led to the betterment of the common man's lot, have arisen from the least recognized of our society. Yet today we find that churches have strayed from their prophetic origins to become stratified and lethargic, and in places the labor movement has become institutionalized and conservative. God, being the respector of no person or movement, is the judge of all and judgment is determined, in part, by how a movement or a person meets the problem of evil, race discrimination, economic injustice, mass exploitation, human wickedness. Today, these problems if America is to remain democratic, must be met by both the labor movement and the churches acting together to establish more Godly communities in America.

Therefore, to the ministers, priests and rabbis of the South we say: It is your duty to build churches and synagogues whose doors are open to all races and classes. It is your duty to educate your members concerning the social pronouncements of the church and concerning the specific means by which all men can better their economic condition. You should become intimately acquainted with all members of your community and you should stand as men of righteousness--tolerant, but firm in your convictions. Always, in peace or in crisis, you must not only serve as a mediator between the rival factions, but also as a stern prophet rebuking unrighteousness and upholding justice wherever they may be found, denouncing the sins of both greedy capital and labor. As you have joined the local service club to become acquainted with the town fathers and leading business men, you must also become an integral part of the labor movement as a chaplain of a local, fraternal, a trade union member or by some other method.

To the labor leaders of the South we say: It is your duty to educate the laity and clergy of the South about the aims and the methods of the trade union movement. It is also your duty, as a believer, to become an active member of some synagogue or church in your community. Thereby you can be an effective participant in the united effort to make the church live up to its word.

And finally, to both the ministers and labor leaders of the South, we say:

It is your duty to form in every major city and hamlet in America church-labor groups started with the initial purpose of creating a spirit of God-like fellowship between clergymen and labor leaders, and directed toward specific action projects for the betterment of community life in America. Aim at the beginning toward an inter-union, an inter-racial, and an inter-faith fellowship, with members eating, talking, acting and praying together. Progress toward this end may be slow, but remember that common hunger both physical and spiritual---of the stomach and of the soul---speaks a common language. Beware of neglecting your brothers and sisters of the rural South . . . those small farmers, sharecroppers, tenant farmers, day laborers and migrants who are still the disfranchised majority of the South, handicapped by lack of educational opportunity, poverty and disunity. Your aim should be to create an understanding between the farm worker and the urban laborer, to name the organization which, under the disguise of being a people's organization, collaborates with the malefactors of great wealth both at home and in Washington, and to herald the organizations which are bringing a measure of freedom to those who labor on the land, in the shed and in the cannery.

WORKSHOP II

THE MEDIA OF COMMUNICATION

In order to further the program of spiritual and social advance which this conference advocates, our committee recommends that greater attention be given to the available means of communication---the radio, newspapers, motion pictures, the spoken word, etc.

The committee believes that the conference and representatives of the organizations represented at the conference should take certain definite steps to provide the public with full information about their program. We recommend:

1. That we use all of our facilities and our influence to get opinion-forming agencies---the press, radio, motion pictures, schools and churches---to give greater consideration to the common objectives of true religion and economic democracy.

2. That we invite all public spirited agencies, particularly the churches of all faiths, to join with us in this undertaking.

We suggest implementation of this program in the following manner:

(a) By acquainting editors, writers, reporters, radio commentators, teachers, women's organizations, farm organizations and others with our program through personal contact, the writing of letters and the regular issuance of press releases.

(b) By supplying the communication services with accurate information, factual letters to the readers' column, and news fillers and cartoons.

(c) By correcting false and detrimental statements with which the public is constantly bombarded. (This can best be done by confining one's statements to factual and constructive information).

(d) By commanding, through use of letters and public statements, those who voice opinions in harmony with our objectives.

We further recommend:

That the Religion and Labor Foundation study the possibilities of establishing a special committee and the assigning of a staff officer to the carrying out of the suggestions made herein.

WORKSHOP III

ECONOMIC RESTRAINTS ON THE CHURCH

In analyzing the economic forces in the community that interfere with preaching and exemplification of the full gospel of justice and brotherhood, the members of this group reached the following conclusions:

1. The primary economic restraining forces within our present economic system are those which struggle through individuals selfishly for profits, power and white supremacy.

Employers of labor who are members of the institutions of religion and almost universally on the governing boards of these institutions, exercise the major restraining influence upon the preaching and exemplification of the full gospel of justice and brotherhood.

Another economic restraining force---a phase of the one just given---is that exercised by the politicians representing the dominant economic group in the community.

2. The second conclusion was that because of the prevailing customs relating to white and negro groups and other minority groups, the religious leader is often restrained from preaching and carrying out his religious convictions and those of his religious body on brotherhood and justice.

3. The third conclusion was that while extremists on the side of either management or labor often use anti-semitism as a means of distracting attention from the real management-labor issues, Christian leaders, not wishing to take sides, fail to attack the scapegoat issue of anti-semitism.

SUGGESTED METHODS OF DEALING WITH THOSE ECONOMIC RESTRAINTS ON THE CHURCH

1. The religious leaders preach and exemplify the full gospel of their faiths---as expressed in the social creed of their religious body.

2. (a) The religious leaders get in touch with the leaders of the trade unions and of the co-operatives in their communities. This means rural and urban. Offer their services in conducting classes on economic issues in the workers and farmer educational groups. If there are no trade workers and co-operatives in their communities, contact the National Headquarters of the Farm and Trade Unions, urge that organizers be sent into the community, and through personal contacts with the workers and farmers of their communities, impress upon them their duty to join organizations of their own choosing.

(b) The religious leaders, in speaking to the Labor and Farm organizations, urge the members of the same to affiliate with the religious organization of their own choosing; in an active capacity so that they can support their religious leader in carrying out the SOCIAL CREED.

3. Religious leaders invite the members of Labor and Farm organizations to attend and participate in their Labor Sunday services. Labor leaders invite religious leaders to attend and participate in their Labor Day meetings.

4. Religious leaders, wherever they have a Ministerial Union, work for an inter-racial and inter-faith organization wherever feasible. Also, invite the Local Unions of City or County Labor body to send fraternal delegates to their meetings.

5. Wherever there are discriminations in church, synagogue, or labor organizations, we recommend that members of both groups work for the elimination of these discriminations.

6. Religious leaders organize symposiums and forums on religion and labor before various church groups, i.e. Men's Brotherhoods, Women and Young People's Societies.

7. Religious leaders study labor-management conflicts in their community and offer their services as conciliators, mediators, and arbitrators.

8. Religious leaders and groups maintain civil rights in their communities. In case a trade union group cannot find a hall in which to meet, offer the use of a room in the religious institution. Protect the right of both labor and management to organize and bargain collectively, if need be to go on the picket line with the workers where they have been denied the right to organize and bargain collectively.

9. Religious leaders cooperate with the representatives of the organized labor, in organizing the employers of the unorganized church and synagogue printing plants.

10. Religious leaders and labor leaders analyzed Capitalism and the competing economic philosophies from the standpoint of religious and ethical principles and then work for that type of economic order which the individual feels is the highest and best.

11. Join the official social action group of your particular religious body.

12. Join the unofficial social action group of your particular religious body and work for its objectives. The following is a statement of purpose of one of the official organizations.

An organization which rejects the method of the struggle for profit as the economic base for society, and which seeks to replace it with social and economic planning in order to develop a society without class distinctions and privileges. It seeks the establishment of full democracy and unreserved brotherhood in our political, economic, and social life.

In case your religious group does not have an unofficial social action group, organize one.

13. Cooperate with Willard Uphaus of the Religion and Labor Foundation and with John Ramsay in the setting up of local Religion and Labor groups and local clergy and labor fellowship dinner groups.

WORKSHOP IV

YOUTH, EDUCATION AND LABOR

"My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge" was the underlying assumption accepted by the commission as a basis for their discussion. A young person, in the school and community has difficulty in obtaining an adequate picture of the whole life of the community. While business interests have access to the churches, schools and textbooks, and can use these sources against labor, labor doesn't have an adequate opportunity to present its views. The youth of the nation represents the potential labor of tomorrow. Becoming interested in and informed about labor and then problems while youth paves the way for broader understanding and helpfulness when a youth becomes a worker. Leadership of informed Churchmen with a personal knowledge of problems confronted by the working-man is essential to the advancement of the dignity of labor.

In the light of this situation, the Resolution Commission had the following suggestions to make:

1. Trying to get courses on labor history and problems into the curriculum of schools, colleges, seminaries. Where these exist, to attempt to get these courses related to the facts of life---working in factories, field, etc.

2. Where it is impossible, at present, to get labor courses in the curriculum, the commission felt that "dedicated and principled teachers" could, through their own ingenuity, work into some existing courses a complete picture, which would include labor problems.

3. Students can organize to request certain basic courses, invite speakers and discussion leaders who know labor, to campus, assemblies, conferences, workshop groups, etc.

4. The above two points are based on the recognition that the societal framework has to be changed so that school boards will be representative of all groups in the community.

5. Interested youth and adult groups can secure information from liberal and labor press---i.e. school librarian should have these books, newspapers and periodicals available.

6. Forums on basic labor issues.

7. Working contacts with labor and management (student mock labor-management conferences).

8. Elimination of inter-racial and inter-cultural barriers in all of these suggested activities.

9. (Economic Justice, January 1947, pages 7 and 8).

10. We recognize that books need to be made more realistic and applicable to daily life and the giving of a well-rounded picture.

11. Industrial and rural work camps would serve an opportunity for getting young people in contact with working conditions, unions, management, etc.

12. Students doing volunteer work for various organizations like the Religion and Labor Foundation.

13. Work with vocational counselors and placements persons.

14. Organize democratic student groups.

WORKERS AND COMMUNITY EDUCATION

1. Workers Education and extension services in communities should be encouraged. That the National government devote resources and an educational extension service to labor.

2. Need for education in the labor movement is recognized in that some labor unions are guilty of hampering equal opportunities for all people. We recognize that this, in goodpart, is a reflection of our present economic and social system, which places emphasis on scarcity and profits. At the same time we feel it is important that the fact be known that the organized labor movement is largely responsible for initiating the free public education system, and vocational guidance in schools.

3. Unions and churches can use existing agency and program potentialities to get the needed changes in our educational set-up---i.e. teacher's union, if courageous, can assure academic freedom. While the major denominations and faiths have gone on record approving the right of labor to bargain collectively, it must be recognized that where its publishing houses are not organized, its literature and leadership not leading youth and adult to face the moral responsibility toward rights of working people, the church is not fulfilling its responsibility.

4. That a continuing committee of the conference prepare a digest of information about resource materials and agencies, that would be helpful for those who work in this field of religion and labor development.

CONCLUSION: We are after education, facts, and not indoctrination in both religion and labor. Religiously we must educate our people to abandon the existing idea that some people are inherently unable to develop higher living standards or to enjoy the finer things of life. Concerted community and educational efforts to reach the young people in the formative stages of life---public and high schools must be adopted.

While we recognize the need for basic economic and social changes we must nevertheless take a stand in the present situation that is based on the prophetic insight into that the nature of what a new society ought to be.

WORKSHOP V

THE SOUTH AS AN ECONOMIC DEPENDENCY

PREAMBLE:

In our study together of the economically dependent and subjugated status of the South, we have recognized the violation of human personality and brotherhood, principles basic for our religion. It is in an effort to serve these basic religious principles that we now seek to outline some of the ramifications of the disadvantageous status of the South, and to propose for conference adoption a program of action aimed at remedying the situation and developing a Southland marked by that abundance which is potentially in the hands of the people of the South by the grace of God, Who is the source of all good things.

We have recognized that a contribution to the solution of the problem of the South will be a contribution to the solution of the problem of the similarly situated West, the workers and farmers of the North, and the exploited and colonial people of the entire world.

PROBLEM:

To an astounding degree the economic ownership and control of the South is concentrated in a small number of billion-dollar corporations which in turn, through interlocking, are largely controlled by a handful of American families. To a disturbing and intolerable degree the wealth produced by the workers and farmers of the South has left the South to enlarge the already super-abundant coffers of the few monopolistic corporations and dominant families.

Letit be clear from the outset that the interests of the West are at one with the Northern common people. We are all threatened by the autocratic and monopolistic concentration of power to which we have referred. There seems to be an inevitable centrifugal or expansionist tendency or drive growing out of this unhealthy concentration. We speak here not only of the drive for foreign markets, but also for investments all over the world. The billions of dollars worth of capital available for investment now seek to control and own economic enterprises in virtually every area of the world. We have not been unaware of the fact that this situation serves as an ominous threat to the peace of the world. We know, therefore, that to free our Southland from its present subjugated and dependent economic status is to contribute in no small measure to the peace of the world.

We are sure further that a more democratic and equitable distribution of the power and wealth now concentrated in so few hands will contribute to the freedom, welfare and security of other peoples mentioned above, who are threatened by the present concentration of monopoly and power.

We have seen in our study many illustrations of the draining of the natural resources of the South by corporations, for example lumber interests owned and controlled in the northeast. We have faced too a serious and continuous draining of our region's human resources, as year after year young men and women migrate from our area to areas of greater economic opportunity. We have been disturbed by the evidences of the alarming extent to which the non-Southern control and ownership of the South has been reflected in the actions and inactions of our southern politicians, who often seem to work hand in glove with northern corporate interests. The Bulwinkle Bill sponsored by a southern Congressman and supported amazingly by other southern Congressmen, is a striking evidence of the extent to which the link between present political machines in the South and Northern monopolies work against the interest of the South.

This freight rate differential, to which we have referred in the preceding paragraph, is one reason for the under-industrialization of the South when compared with other areas. This is a serious problem today. It will be far more serious if the expected mechanization of agriculture develops, and if a national depression sends back to the south unemployed workers in search of jobs.

The tendencies for economic nationalism and high tariffs, which have added strength today as a result of the Republican victory, present, as before a great threat to the South. On the whole, a high tariff system is in the interest of monopolistic northern industries and at the expense of the South as a whole, and perhaps especially its agricultural population. Under a high tariff the Southern farmer, for example, loses much of his market, notably his cotton market, and thus sees the prices of his product go down while he must pay higher tariff prices for his machinery, artificially maintained in the service of northern and monopolistic industries.

We all know that southern workers have been and continue to be paid less for their work than for workers at the same jobs in other areas. And the workers of the south have been handicapped in an effort to end this inequality by their lack of trade union organization, their lack of political rights (including often the right to vote) etc. We, the people of the South, have also suffered from a serious lack of education, including education about our problem and its solution.

Whence came the economic status of dependency and subjugation which is our great problem? Whence came the accompanying disability of our southern regions? One factor in the absentee control of the South is the Civil War and its economic consequences. To a significant extent, the Civil War represented not only a military victory, but an economic victory for capitalistic industry centered in the North. We have given specific attention, for example, to the railroad corporations and the power they attained following the Civil War. But we cannot and do not look to the Civil War and its aftermath as an alibi for the problems confronted by the Southern people. We have no desire for a return to a feudal system of human slavery. We want a truly and fully democratic South, controlled by all of its people in the interest of all of its people. We know that we cannot make the significant strides that are needed until we break more completely with the feudal patterns which separate the common people and deny that unity and brotherhood which they must have for a victory in a common struggle.

Program of Action.

1. Organize the common people: Workers into trade unions, farmers into progressive farmer unions, consumers into consumers' leagues and cooperatives, etc. Maintain the new threatened right and power of organized labor, including the right to bargain on an industry-wide basis---so important to elimination of present wage rate differentials, (including racial differentials). A strong, intelligent labor movement is our greatest hope for democracy and security.

2. Political education and action. The people must be informed of the facts and must all take political action as citizens, based on these facts. This necessitates universal suffrage and an end to all undemocratic voting restrictions, as the poll tax, the white primary, etc.

3. Defeat the Bulwinkle Bill and continue the fight for full equalization of freight rates.

4. Stimulate home-owned industries, using such methods as the separation tax, the taxation of outgoing wealth, etc.

5. Expand Federal aid to southern states on the basis of need. Support the National Health Act, the Federal Aid to Education Bill, expansion of Social Security and the inclusion of groups now excluded (as domestic and agricultural workers), the continuance and expansion of Federal Aid to southern farmers through long-term, low-interest loans, etc., and of Federal Aid to highways.

6. More T.V.A's.

7. Regional planning on behalf of Southern resources and development.

8. Strengthen the anti-trust act.

9. Dispose of War surplus on a preferential basis to the advantage of southern communities and home-owned industry.

10. Continue and extend the Reciprocal Trade program.

We call on religious individuals and organizations to work with labor and other progressive groups for this program.

Points for Further Study.

1. Absentee ownership and control.
2. Cartels.
3. The link of political machines with non-southern monopolistic businesses.

WORKSHOP VI

SOCIAL AND LABOR LEGISLATION

Believing that principles are only made operative through specific programs of action the Southern Religion and Labor Conference adopts the following legislative platform for its work during the coming year:

We heartily endorse legislation on the Federal and State level which seeks to guarantee every man's God-given right to work, for we believe that every man has a basic right to a job. No adequate solution of labor-management problems is possible through restrictive legislation, specifically through anti-closed shop bills.

The right to work is not an absolute right but one governed by the rights of fellow workers. The right to organize and bargain collectively implies the right to use the required means for those purposes. But in our Southern states where a great number of employers consistently oppose unions or, at best, tolerate them, union security in the form of the Union Shop is a required means to attain a legiitimate aim of organized labor, namely security. Therefore, if we admit the natural right of workers to organize, we must not deny them a required means to exercise that right effectively.

The Union Shop, that is one in which the majority of the workers require all the workers to be members of a union, is a democratic institution. Majority rule is a fundamental principle in our democracy. To prevent the Union Shop on the pretense that it is unfair to the non-union minority is, in fact, an injustice to the majority in the shop. The union members probably risked their jobs and certainly made sacrifices to get their union recognized, to obtain good wages and working conditions, and to maintain job security. For non-union workers to profiteer on these sacrifices by accepting the fruits and refusing to contribute, morally and financially is clearly unjust. And yet, the state is being asked to legalize this injustice.

As a further guarantee of the right to work, we recommend that Southern employers and Southern unions must re-examine and revise employment practices resulting in discrimination and should take steps toward the inclusion in their collective bargaining contracts the principles of "equal pay for equal work" and "equal opportunity to work."

We support legislation for full production and full and fair employment in industry and in agriculture. Full production is necessary for domestic well-being and to feed and clothe a hungry and impoverished world. Your committee recommends:

(a) Endorsement and support of measures to raise the minimum wage standards of the Fair Labor Standards Act to an immediate 65¢ and an eventual 75¢ an hour, and to liberalize the coverage to include all classes of wage earners engaged in occupations which affect commerce between the states.

(b) The expansion and improvement of Social Security and the inclusion thereunder of farm workers, domestic workers and the self-employed.

(c) Standards of child labor legislation on the state level at least equal to the federal provisions of the F.I.S.A.

(d) That payments under Unemployment Compensation and Workman's Compensation be increased.

(e) That legislation for state wage and hour laws be introduced in the several states.

(f) That a State Labor Relations Act providing guarantees for the exercise of concerted organization rights and collective bargaining for workers in intra-state industry be introduced in the several states.

(g) We are deeply concerned by the already visible displacement of Southern farmers and farm workers by mechanized farming. This movement is gathering momentum; in the fore-see-able future millions of southerners will be without means of livelihood.

Therefore we request that the State and Federal Governments proceed at once to make plans and provisions for placing these displaced persons in productive work, supplying land tools for farming jobs on reclamation, and other needed public work funds to carry these hapless people through the transition period.

Recognizing the likeness of God in every man of whatever race or color, upon which fact rests man's natural rights and in consonance with the fundamental principles of our democracy, we proclaim our belief in the enjoyment of equal rights for all citizens under the laws of the land.

In keeping with said belief we hereby declare that there should not be any denial of the fundamental rights of citizenship to any segment of our people based upon race or color. Accordingly therefore, we condemn such unfair and unjustifiable devices as the white primary and the poll tax.

While being unalterably opposed to the poll tax, we call upon the church and labor leaders to cooperate on furthering campaigns to persuade all Church and Labor members to pay their poll taxes to register and to vote.

We call upon the legislatures of the Southern states to desist from such undemocratic and unconstitutional practices and we call upon the Congress to enact anti-lynching legislation and to abolish the undemocratic filibuster.

Under the religious and democratic understanding of man, the full life for all men depends upon an environment which guarantees good and adequate housing, education, health facilities, social security and fair taxation based upon the individual's capacity to pay. We believe that it is the responsibility of democratically-elected governments on the local, state and federal levels to provide such a social environment for all persons by maintaining, strengthening and expanding present programs and by:

a. Providing good and adequate housing for all persons.
b. Providing equal educational opportunities for all persons in schools of the highest education standards.
c. Expanding social security programs so that all citizens are adequately covered with benefits which will guarantee adequate support in old age and in times of unemployment.
d. Adopting a program of compulsory national health insurance.
e. And revising state and local tax systems on the basis of equitable distribution and ability to pay. We feel that the general sales tax violates equity.

SUPPLEMENTARY RESOLUTIONS

RESOLUTION AGAINST UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING AND FOR A JUST AND DURABLE WORLD PEACE.

Whereas the organized religious and labor movements have traditionally opposed universal military training, and whereas this opposition has been reaffirmed at recent meetings and conventions of these groups, and

WHEREAS the President has set up an Advisory Commission on Universal Training which has no labor and no adequate church representation, and

WHEREAS all the indications point to this "pro-conscription commission" bringing in a report in favor of universal military training, and

WHEREAS the organized religious and labor movements are dedicated to working for universal disarmament and world peace.

Be it hereby resolved that the Southern region of the National Religion and Labor Foundation go on record as opposing any form of universal military training or the extension of the Selective Service Act and

Be it further resolved that we urge wholehearted support of the United Nations program of disarmament and urge that the UN go on record in favor of worldwide abolition of universal military training.

RESOLUTION TO THE PRESIDENT

The (160) one hundred sixty members, delegates, and representatives of the N.R.L.F. now assembled in Atlanta, Georgia February 4-5, 1947 do along with the many other religious and labor groups, leading educators and authors, appeal that you declare an amnesty for the 6,000 or more C.O.'s who have been imprisoned, many of whom are members of religious and labor groups in America, thereby restoring to them all civil rights.

Jobs Peace Freedom

by Henry A. Wallace

MY JOB AS EDITOR of the New Republic is to help organize a progressive America. It is a fighting job, the most worthwhile job I ever had. A world at peace is the hope of every American, and a progressive America is the hope of the world. To help build a program for such an America is as great an opportunity as my first days in the cabinet of Franklin Roosevelt in 1933.

I find no lasting defeat in the recent setbacks to the Democratic Party, but a challenge to make a new start. The American people have rejected, as they will always reject, a Democratic Party that is not militantly progressive. Americans have called for a new leadership. They will not find it in the present Republican hierarchy; until they find it, they will not rest.

Progressives are no small and beaten group. We stand as the proud inheritors of the greatest tradition in America, the Roosevelt tradition. Our task is to recast that tradition in terms of today. The progressives have not stopped fighting—they have just begun to fight.

It is no part of our tradition to look backward, reconstructing the fragments of the New Deal, bemoaning the loss of the wartime unity of the Allies and torturing ourselves with the thought: if he had lived. For Roosevelt there were no endings, only beginnings. To be faithful to the Roosevelt tradition today is to look ahead, seeking a new program for domestic prosperity and world unity, and new sources of support for that program among all Americans.

As we prepare for a new start, there is much we can learn from Roosevelt, both in his way of thought and in his way of action.

He was a progressive first and a Democrat second. Above all, he was a master politician, skillfully improvising from day to day new devices to hold together the cotton bloc, the silver bloc, union labor, the big city machines and, most important of all, the independent liberals. Often he seemed to be going in two directions at the same time. When a group would place its narrow, selfish interest above the general welfare, he would usually listen patiently and sympathetically. He called this "babying" them along. But there was always a system in his "babying." He always had his eye on the general welfare, even though he might be approaching it by the most indirect route. He combined this skilled political in-fighting with a direct radio appeal to the common sense of the people.

In the international field, Roosevelt used the same techniques. Stalin was deeply bound to Marxism, Churchill to empire and the status quo. Roosevelt's faith was equally strong, but he never permitted himself to be tied to any rigid dogma. He believed that all anti-fascist forces could be held together by common interest and by common sense.

Where Roosevelt failed, it was because he lacked organized support. He had no unified labor movement and no coherent liberal movement with which to work. The people were for him but they didn't know how to help him. During all the days of the New Deal, there was no systematic educational work: nor, apart from the PAC, which reached only the industrial centers, was an effort made to build a political machine to express liberal thought in action. Only in Roosevelt's first term did the progressives really have a majority in Congress. After that, the passage of progressive measures was largely due to Roosevelt's own skill. In wartime, Roosevelt became a national leader and looked for support from all Americans. Had we fought the war in a spirit of blood, tears, toil and sweat, we should have been prepared for the inevitable hardship of the postwar years. But the all-party character of the Administration and the absence of widely accepted war aims obscured for us the essentially progressive character of the war. That is why in Europe progressives are on the march and in America reactionaries win the votes.

WE NEED to learn all these lessons as we start over. Once the gallant heart and political skill of one man saved first the United States and finally the world. A great movement will produce more great men. But today the work which should have been done can no longer wait. We need to do more than improvise. We must plan in long-range terms. We must gather together progressives and fighters for peace from all parties, all regions and all groups. We must organize a nucleus of progressive energy and inspiration. Our purpose is not to criticize from the sidelines. It is to develop a program and carry it to all Americans. No democratic group is beyond our reach in developing this program—farm, labor, veterans', middle-class, business, professional, educational and religious groups are a part of it. Our ideals are the ideals of a living, dynamic America. We shall fail only if we restrict ourselves. We shall succeed through the broadest appeal—carried to every county in America and to every country in the world.

WHAT IS the basis for our new start? There is nothing obscure in what we represent. We stand for the American tradition. Not the false tradition of dollar diplomacy or high prices created by monopolistic scarcity, but the true American tradition, the tradition that is universal and has never been completely fulfilled—life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Those three conditions in our Declaration of Independence are today a Declaration of Interdependence for the world. Today they mean peace, freedom and jobs for all.

Diehards of the Right today assert that jobs for all are beyond the reach of a society based on peace and freedom. Diehards of the Left maintain that freedom must be sacrificed for the sake of jobs and peace. Modern imperialists dream that in the name of jobs and freedom we shall fight a third world war.

Rejecting all these, I stand for one idea: that jobs, peace and freedom can be attained together and can make possible One World, prosperous and free, within our lifetime.

We can achieve peace, jobs and freedom in One World without war. But we cannot preserve any one of these conditions in any country unless we achieve all three in all countries. Peace, freedom and jobs for all are indivisible. Before we win lasting peace, we must achieve some measure of world government and law. But society comes before government, as our own history proves. Before we get world government and law, all peoples must become in some measure part of One World. America will never be part of One World in which there is not civil liberty. The USSR will never be part of One World in which there is not economic and social security. All who really believe in One World recognize that the search for peace, freedom and jobs for all is one worldwide search. This search is the basis for our new start.

Jobs for all means action now to prevent a serious depression in the United States. A depression is coming unless we act to prevent it. If depression comes, two-thirds of all veterans who have started their own businesses will go bankrupt; farmers will face foreclosure; workers will be unemployed. When 2.5 million veterans have no homes, when 20 million American families have incomes of less than $40 a week, when other millions have used up all their savings, a depression in America means disaster. Lowered production in America will cause depression everywhere.

TRADITIONALLY, Republicans are against government action to prevent depressions. Most Republican congressmen believe in complete freedom for large corporations to hold up prices by monopoly, while the prices of farm products and the wages of labor are beaten down. Traditional Republican policy calls for high tariffs, thus intensifying depression. For this reason, the world expects the depression to come sooner and to be more severe as the result of the Republican victory.

For years progressives have stood for high production. Recently, reactionaries have called for "production at any price" in an effort to destroy price controls. I hope they will go on calling for production, now that controls are off. One agency exists to help maintain production—the President's Economic Advisory Council. The Council is supposed to keep the President continually informed on the economic health of the nation and to make suggestions which the President can pass on to Congress. The fact that Congress is Republican does not relieve either the progressives, the Council or the President from working out an effective program. Businessmen and labor leaders will support it.

The function of business today is to produce goods abundantly at reasonable prices, pay decent wages and make a fair profit. Industry cannot and should not bear the sole responsibility for keeping our economy at full production. Full employment at fair standards is the responsibility of government. We are for whatever measures democratic government must take, in low-cost housing, public health, regional development, foreign loans, the provision of minimum standards, progressive taxation, the lowering of prices through trust-busting or the efficient operation of disorganized basic industries by government ownership or control.

Peace today means action to halt the dangerous drift toward war. This drift has gone so far that all governments act as if they had a mandate from their people to prepare to win the next war. Through this false mandate the most trivial issues become insoluble because they are seen as war preparations. The United States is led to squander its greatness in propping up corrupt and undemocratic regimes as supposed safeguards against communism. In the name of security, America is spending $13 billion a year on armaments and Russia is keeping five million young men in the Red Army while factories and fields lie idle. In the name of security, we are destroying UNRRA and refusing to send food and supplies to relieve famine and misery overseas because relieving famine and misery among other peoples is supposed to raise their ability to fight a war. To carry out a political purpose we are condemning thousands of people to death and millions to misery. In the name of security, German scientists are working in Russia to develop rockets capable of attacking America while other German scientists work in America to develop rockets capable of attacking Russia, at a time when American and Russian veterans are still dying of wounds inflicted by Germans. Our present search for security leads to insecurity and war. We are searching in the wrong ways, and the search itself is vain. Security alone can never be achieved. We can no more find security by searching for security than we can find happiness by searching for happiness.

OUR PROGRAM for peace is to abolish the causes of war. Real security is gained when democracy is practised everywhere, when living standards are raised, when all nations accept world law. Leaders of the present bipartisan bloc maintain that welfare comes after the peace settlement is made and security established. I answer that there will be no permanent settlement and no security until a world welfare program is begun.

This means a Peoples' Peace for every nation in the world based on the idea of an all-out effort to eliminate illiteracy and starvation. To establish a peoples' peace there must be international planning by the United States, England and Russia to increase the productivity of the so-called backward areas by irrigation dams, power dams, railroads, docks, highways, agricultural machines textile mills, machine tools and hospitals.

We need two 20-year plans. One, the elimination of illiteracy and starvation from the world by 1966. Two, the elimination of transmissible disease and the establishment of higher worldwide living standards by 1986. Technologically, it can be done. Morally, it must be done. Practically, it is cheaper than war and the only alternative to war.

This program of making world welfare a primary objective does not mean abandoning a security program. It means disarmament, including the effective dismantling of our stockpile of atomic bombs. It means opposing every step in the scramble for uranium resources and overseas air bases. It means supporting collective security through effective international inspection and control of activities that could be a part of war preparations.

ALL PEOPLES will support this program. They have had enough of the continuous battle for position in Germany, in the Balkans and Greece as the Anglo-Americans coöperate with the extreme right-wing elements and the Russians coöperate with the extreme left wing in nations where most of the people can't read or write and where there never has been any real democracy. They have had enough of the three great nations' reaching out to grab air and naval bases so they can attack each other. They want freedom of peaceful passage by sea and through the air combined with sufficient inspection to make sure of the peacefulness. They want the Panama Canal, Suez Canal, the Dardanelles and the Danube to be freely open to peaceful shipping on a basis that will fully allay the security fears of the Anglo-Americans and the Russians and at the same time enlarge the peaceful commerce of the world to the maximum. They want the oil of the Near East made available to the peoples of the world according to the principles of the Atlantic Charter and not according to the needs of the American, British or Russian military machines. Finally, we recognize that there will never be peace until justice and mercy have been given to the Jews in Europe and Palestine.

Freedom for us is basic; we can never compromise our faith in civil liberty. Man must have bread to live, but he doesn't live by bread alone and as soon as he has bread, he must have freedom to learn the facts of the world he lives in and the right to speak his mind about those facts. Those who deny this freedom have no part in the progressive movement.

THE DRIVE toward war today is a drive against freedom. Reaction—the same force which condemns vigorous government action for the general welfare as incompatible with freedom—is today cutting down freedom. The next stage in the drift toward all-out atomic war will put most of our freedoms at the disposal of an all-powerful military. At secret committee hearings the military will tell Congress why it needs a greatly extended secret police and why the United States should be in position to strike without the formalities of a declaration of war. The military, coöperating with their good friends among the larger corporations, will plan for decentralizing our factories and our population. The cost of preparation for all-out atomic war will be so high as to make the military more important as a source of employment than any 50 corporations. Everywhere we turn we shall face the government as the master of our economic and our personal destinies. Down this road lies American fascism—less brutal but infinitely more powerful in its ultimate compulsions than anything that Mussolini fostered. It is our responsibility as progressives to fight for an alternative to an atomic-arms race because only in this way can we preserve that freedom which is synonymous with the American way of life.

One of our most precious freedoms is the right to learn the truth. The common man is in danger of losing that right when 90 percent of his mental food is prepared for him every day by those who select the news to prove a point—and that point either reactionary or Marxist. We shall never have really warm friendship between the United States and Russia and a firm basis for peace until the peoples of both nations are given free access to the unbiased truth and complete freedom to express their reactions to that truth.

Freedom does not mean merely the absence of government control. The whole history of civilized social life has been the recognition that smaller freedoms must be given up in order to attain a larger freedom. Individual automobile drivers must give up their freedom to drive at 80 miles an hour in order to give all of us a greater sense of security on the highways. Individual farmers in Sweden must get a license to cut down a tree on their own properties. Under the Soil Conservation Act individual American farmers were not given "benefit payments" unless they took measures to improve their soil. The New Deal restricted hundreds of small freedoms in order to gain a few larger freedoms.

TODAY democracy is a universal ambition. The Soviet government no longer prides itself on the Dictatorship of the Proletariat. It describes Soviet communism as "a higher form of democracy." Some Americans greet this assertion with derisive laughter. They forget that two-thirds of the world laughs at freedom in America, remembering our discrimination against Negroes, Jews and other minorities.

I prefer to accept the willingness of the Soviet leaders to think more and more in democratic terms—and, in accordance with the Roosevelt tradition, I shall search for the best in all peoples

The Soviet government bases its claim to democracy on the complete equality in the USSR among minorities and between the sexes; on the absence of any kind of discrimination; on the economic and social rights and opportunities guaranteed to all Soviet citizens; and on the absence in the USSR of powerful, private monopolies of press, radio and movies.

These arguments may be brushed aside in the US, but a large part of the world accepts them as a serious challenge to America. It is for us also to accept them as a challenge and make discrimination a crime, provide full and equal opportunities for all our citizens and enlarge freedom of expression.

We cannot hide the weaknesses in our democracy. If we take steps to overcome these weaknesses, then I believe the Russians, believing in the genuineness of our democracy, will move toward greater political freedom. Then one root cause of war will die away. Around these issues, I believe, our new start will be made.

Today, of course, we progressives are in the opposition in Congress. As a minority party the Republicans were interested solely in opposition and placed that opposition above the general welfare of the US and of the world. That is why we are suffering inflation and facing depression today. In contrast, the Democrats need to show how an opposition should act. They should generously support good legislation and vigorously fight bad legislation. We must not assume that all Republicans are reactionary tories. We must assume that many millions who voted Republican last November believe in One World and not in isolation.

Certainly as progressives we shall appeal to these millions. Our purpose is not to play party politics or palace politics, but to develop a program around which men of good will can gather. I have said many harsh things about the Republican Party, but I have never spoken badly of the rank and file of the Republicans. They were my people. My father was a Republican Secretary of Agriculture. I know how progressive the Republican farmers of Iowa can be when they really understand a problem. I have the greatest respect for the Republican farmers and small manufacturers of New England and the Middle Atlantic States as I have met them from time to time.

Of course, we need organization. The primary effort of progressives may be to rebuild the Democratic Party as a liberal party. But we are the captives of no party. If the Democratic Party is incapable of change, we shall strike out along other lines.

And we need a progressive press to develop our program, to organize a nucleus of support and to keep in touch with each other the world over. In days when reactionaries call the tune and the daily press dances to it, a weekly magazine is the best medium. That is why I have become Editor of the New Republic. I intend to make it the means through which the spirit of our new start can be expressed.

MY FIELD is the world. My strength is my conviction that a progressive America can unify the world and a reactionary America must divide it. My enemy is blind reaction, placing profit before production, depression before effective government and war ahead of a rising standard of living for the peoples of the backward areas. My friends are all who believe in true democracy. My master is the common man, striving to educate himself and his children for a richer, more abundant life. I seek no personal gain. If I have importance, it is because of the ideas that I have come to represent. They are major ideas, indestructible and on the march. ★ ★ ★

A new force is born . . .

SOMETIMES in the affairs of great nations a powerful clear-voiced opposition can prevent ill-advised national policy. Thirty-two years ago a well-known, trusted group of able, liberal-minded men created the NEW REPUBLIC to rally the forces of liberalism around a sound long-range national and international program.

Today the forces of violent reaction are reappearing. Twelve years of powerful leadership have been followed by a lack of leadership in national affairs. The need is greater than ever before.

Today, the new NEW REPUBLIC, under the editorship of Henry A. Wallace, provides a rallying point for those millions of Americans who refuse to stand idly by while, in the zeal of conservatism, the many sound advances of the New Deal are swept into oblivion.

The new NEW REPUBLIC is a liberal paper. To us, liberalism does not mean communism, socialism, Soviet baiting, or star gazing. It means looking forward, a determination to plan for the future.

In Henry A. Wallace we believe we have precisely the man who can best pilot the new NEW REPUBLIC. His record shows his understanding of the need for long-range plans. He has the capacity to provide inspiration, to rally believers in fundamental Americanism. His experience gives him an understanding of the actual facts about government and people. He has the necessary capacity for dynamic leadership – our most precious and our rarest commodity.

In breaking down the final barrier to one free world, the new NEW REPUBLIC will be a weapon worthy of Wallace. A group of editors whose average age is 31, is setting out under Wallace to produce an exciting paper with important ideas. We have done as much as we could in a few weeks to make the new NEW REPUBLIC more exciting and important. We intend to do a lot more.

The original editors of the NEW REPUBLIC nailed their colors to the mast when they wrote on the cover of the first issue: "A Journal of Opinion which seeks to meet the challenge of a new time." The time is new, the challenge is great; we are hopeful.

You owe it to yourself, in this time of sweeping change, to keep yourself informed. To be certain of getting every issue of the new NEW REPUBLIC send the coupon below.

TRADE UNIONS

The smoke funnels of the giant Stevens textile mills loomed in the distance. Atlanta-born union organizer Pat Jones slowed his '35 Model A to thirty miles in order to read the sign, "Entering Millville, Population 10,345, Home of Happy Millhands." By the rich suburban homes, by the shacks of the happy millhands down to the main street he rode, and parked by a corner drug store. From his car window Pat slipped a nickel to the local newsboy, opened the paper, and read on the front page in large black type a letter to the editor:

We are all distressed by the impending union drive. Labor is happy here. Now organizers from the North who don't understand our problems are coming. Let us remember that those who take up the sword shall die by the sword, that union men who use force will be destroyed by force. The Christian religion teaches love, persuasion and mutual trust. Therefore, all good citizens of this town should do all in their power to prevent ignorant and unfortunate members of our community from being seduced by these greedy organizers, no matter how lofty their claims may appear.

Yours in Christ,
REV. L. B. ROGERS
Pastor, Stevens Memorial Church

"That Stevens' stooge," Pat grumbled to himself. "That's the reason I've never darkened the door of a church for years."

and PREACHERS

A Worker Asks Some Questions

Late that night down an unlighted street in a hot, box-like company house old Fred Styles, tired and spent after a day at the mill, was talking to his stocky wife, Alene.

"And what did that evangelist say, Hon?"

"Powerful preacher he is, Fred. Preaches right from the Good Book, but somehow I can't warm up to him. He ain't like our preacher, Joe Black. Smith says unions is anti-Christ and the union label, the mark of the beast. Those Yankee Jew organizers, as he calls them, are to be run out of town."

"But what did he say in a Bible way, Alene?" Fred inquired turning up the kerosene lamp for more light.

"Said you couldn't serve two masters — the Stevens at the mills and those Jew union bosses. Said atheists, Unitarians, communists, and free-love people make up those unions, and ended up on the text of not being equally yoked with unbelievers. Then he praised up the Stevens family as standing for law, thriftiness, paying debts, order, prayer, the Christian home, Southern womanhood, and the like."

"Well, to be honest, Dave Stevens ain't so bad."

Their conversation was interrupted by a knock on the door. Fred hobbled to the door, which creaked as he opened it.

"Why come in, Pat Jones," Fred remarked with kindness, beckoning tired Pat to a seat in the gloomy living room.

"How's the family?" Pat inquired, surprised by Alene's sudden exit to the kitchen.

"Okay, except for our son Joe who's been sick. But the millboss, Dave Stevens, sent around Doc Clark, and Joe's okay now. Hate to go begging to Stevens, though."

"That's just what I'm here trying to get at," Pat interjected. "If you were a union man, you wouldn't have to be asking Stevens for any favors. You'd be independent. You could hire a doctor yourself."

"Maybe so, but there's a catch in this union business somewhere. Preacher Smith said it was a Jew organization," Fred frowned.

"If you mean, Fred, there are Jews in the union, you're right. Good unions are open for every American. For Jews, Italians, and a lot of folks here in the South, the union's doing a lot to lick sweatshops, low wages, long hours. What's more, we've got an educational program, too. Northern and Southern workers got to stick together and not fight each other. Low wages in the South mean low wages in the North and vice versa. And speaking of that fellow Evangelist Smith, I'll bet he's never seen the statements of most of the Southern denominations favoring collective bargaining."

"What do you mean?" Fred queried with obvious surprise.

"Just this," retorted Pat reaching in his pocket and drawing out a little pamphlet. "Now show this to your preacher, and to Smith, too. It's a statement on how the denominations stand on labor questions."

And Gets Some Answers

The very next night Fred Styles invited in his pastor, Joe Black, a young clergyman fresh out of seminary serving what was known in popular parlance as the "millhands' church." At dusk the two were trying to sit comfortably, but without success, on the hard wooden benches on Fred's front porch.

"See here, preacher, what that union fellow gave me," Fred began.

"Let me see . . . say, this is interesting." He reads, "Here's a resolution passed by the Southern Baptist Convention at their annual meeting in Richmond, Virginia, in 1938. Listen. 'We recognize the right of labor to organize and to engage in collective bargaining to the end that labor may have a fair and living wage, such as will provide not only for the necessities of life, but for recreation, pleasure, and culture.'

"And the Methodist Church passed this—'We stand for the right of employees and employers alike to organize for collective bargaining and social action; protection of both in the exercise of this right the obligation of both to work for the public good.'

"It says the Presbyterian Church of U. S., Synod of Tennessee, passed this: 'The right of labor to organize and to bargain collectively with employers is clearly an inalienable right in a democracy and has so been recognized by our government. Surely the church can do no less than to recognize these rights and uphold labor as it seeks to exercise these rights.'

"The Protestant Episcopal Church says this: 'We are convinced that the organization of labor is essential to the well-being of the working people. It is based upon a sense of the inestimable value of the individual man.'

"And remember, Fred, our church took a stand for collective bargaining ten years ago."

"But, preacher,"—there was anxiety in Fred's old voice—"you don't fall back on what the church says. You're supposed to preach from the Bible. That Evangelist, Smith . . ."

Joe interrupted. "Now I'll bet, Fred, he's never preached from Amos, Isaiah, Jeremiah, or Micah in the Old Testament. It's hard to get an anti-union sermon out of them. Just a shepherd, Amos, went to the wicked city of Bethel to condemn the rich who sold the poor for silver and the needy for a pair of shoes. Jeremiah condemned those who use their neighbor's services without wages. And to the prophet Moses, God said, 'I've seen the affliction of the people that are in Egypt and have heard them cry by reason of their taskmasters, and I am come down to deliver them.' This sort of applies to us now, doesn't it?"

"Gosh, Reverend, I've never thought of the prophets that way, or God that way," Fred exclaimed, leaning forward on his bench.

Joe was quick to add, "Jesus was that way, too. The poor heard him gladly. What he said about the rich young fool wasn't exactly complimentary. The rich never liked Jesus, but the poor did. He came that the poor — all men, in fact — might have the abundant life."

"But the abundant life won't come until all men are brothers, until all are converted," was Fred's quick response.

"Yet right now you have to start that brotherhood somewhere. St. Paul said to the early Christians, 'Not many wise men, not many leading men, not many of good birth are called.' That means to me that the true brotherhood must start among poor folks."

"But no white man can be a brother to a nigger," Fred asserted scornfully. "And niggers make up half the working folk of the South."

Joe was slow in replying. "To get back to the Bible: God's no respecter of persons. He made of one blood all nations of men. For decades the employers in factory and field have put white men against black men, and black men against white men. The employer takes the rake-off, and working folk get lower wages. Every city divided against itself cannot stand. Negroes and white folks are going to take it on the chin as long as they are divided."

"Still two wrongs don't make a right," Fred retorted, turning in his seat. "We working folk ought to be kind to the employer no matter how bad he is."

"Sure, be Christian. Kindness, however, must go with justice and equality. It's not right for you to be getting 30 cents an hour and your family going hungry while the company is making fat profits. Convert the employer if you can, Fred. But if you fail you've got to organize and try to bargain collectively for the sake of justice. And then if the employer won't listen, strike."

"That's just making trouble," exclaimed Fred emphatically.

"But, Fred, you can't dodge the question of power. The Christian gospel has something to say about this, about God's part in the people's struggle for enough bread, education, housing, and wages."

"Well," commented Fred obviously drawing into himself. "I'll study on it."

The Union Organizer Visits a Minister

A week later, after spending days and nights visiting the homes of the textile workers, Pat Jones sat in the home of Joe Black berating the attitude of the local clergymen.

"Now, Mr. Black, why are all these local clergymen against us?"

"Well, Mr. Jones," young Joe remarked calmly, "most of them were raised where the words 'union,' 'strike,' 'communist' were all in the same barrel as the words 'city-slicker' and 'sinner.' None of them have known the purposes or the methods of unions."

In reply Pat launched a series of specific complaints against the clergy, and in the course of the conversation, as the men responded to each others' frankness, Pat finally confessed,

"You asked me why the church has left a bad taste in my mouth. When I was a kid down here in the South my mother died of TB from working twelve hours a day in a cotton mill. She died a slow, creeping death. The local preacher prayed for her soul, sent her flowers, and droned something about the Lord giving and the Lord taking away, but he never seemed very interested in how working in that stuffy mill actually killed her. Preaching his crucified Christ and his vengeful God, he praised the mill boss, bragging that he never drank, smoked, or chewed. Maybe so, but that boss killed my mother, and even today hundreds of children in textile towns are hungry, and the workers, doing another man's will, live in daily fear of being fired. That's why I'm organizing today. That's why I'm done with churches which confuse and blind working people."

"You've got a point, Mr. Jones," admitted Joe, "yet I think all of us would do well to realize that today's labor movement had many of its original sources right in the church."

Pat frowned unbelievingly as Joe continued. "Read the 11th Chapter of Hebrews and you'll find a long list of the working leaders of ancient Israel — Noah the shipbuilder, Abraham the herdsman, Isaac and Jacob the farmers, Joseph and Moses the great liberators. All lived by faith that they were part of a long line of builders of a great brotherhood of men under God. Remember Jesus was a carpenter himself; Paul a tent-maker; the early Christians were poor and shared their goods. Their first-century working-class church has been the example of brotherhood for other working people down the centuries. They inspired the early Baptists to fight for political and religious freedom in Europe and America, where most of the first Baptists were working people. In filthy mines and factory towns, John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, preached to the church-neglected workingmen of England. His disciples, or local preachers as they were called, went back to their jobs in the mines and fields and factories, and inspired by his message they organized the beginnings of the British trade union movement. Religion and religion alone made the workers know that they were not serfs but equals of all men. In trade union parades in England today the workers carry signed placards saying, 'Jesus leads and inspires us.' "

"Past history, though, doesn't make up for the fact that the church is slipping from its prophetic moorings," Pat replied, lighting his pipe for the fifth time.

"Granted. But the preachers are not wholly to blame. Take Rogers at the Stevens Church, for instance. He gets all of his information about unions from the foremen, school teachers, and merchants in his church who really don't understand unions. Why not let preachers like Rogers know why a Christian should be for labor organization?"

"Now be frank with me, Reverend," Pat smiled. "You know perfectly well that if I go and see Rogers he'll say that preachers should be concerned only with spiritual questions — sermons, a man's soul, heaven and hell, and the like. I wouldn't get anywhere."

"That all depends on what you and he mean by spiritual questions. God asks us to be brothers; Jesus showed us how to be brothers by his deeds, teachings, death and resurrection. Brotherhood is spiritual, isn't it?"

"Suppose, just to be a little personal, a fellow believes in brotherhood, but leaves God out of the proposition? Is that enough?"

"To me, it isn't. Brotherhood is being denied by many employers daily, and many workers are today willing to sell out to the boss for thirty pieces of silver. What's to keep you from bitterness and disillusionment if the proposed strike fails or if some of the union leaders doublecross you? Somehow, as I look at it, a man must have faith in God if he is to be kept from bitterness, vengeance, and selfishness."

Pat arose to leave without replying. "Thanks for the talk, preacher. Can't see that the churches do much good, though I'd like to hear you preach."

Joe arose. "Come as a spectator if you want, Mr. Jones. But the church won't be any better and more progressive unless folks with high ideals and determination join it. It's like a union in a way. Maybe the president or the vice president isn't the best fellow, but that doesn't keep you from joining to clean up the mess, does it?"

"Sort of hard to join the church when such fellows like Rogers are always interfering with the union work," Pat answered quickly reaching for the door handle.

"Would you like to meet Rogers?" Joe inquired without warning.

Pat was puzzled. "Yes . . . why yes, maybe I would after all, after you've made an introduction."

Two Ministers Have a Talk

"As I said in my letter to the Times," the Rev. L. B. Rogers was expounding to Joe as the two lolled in comfortable easy chairs in the elder's spacious study, "this town has not been peaceful since those alien organizers came to town. The mills were started by the thrifty, church-attending Stevens family. They paid the factory hands what they were worth, made jobs for them, provided schools, playgrounds, houses. What more could the workers want?"

"That's just the trouble, Brother Rogers. The workers are now so dependent on the Stevenses, so willing to accept charity, they won't stand on their own feet."

"But Dave Stevens is kind to all of them. He doesn't fire a man without cause, and a fellow can always take his complaint directly to Stevens," remarked Rogers with an air of certainty.

"Sure. Yet he can still fire a worker without cause. He can fire or hire, school or not school their children, build or break their churches. All power's in his hands. How can you expect a worker to be responsible, enterprising, self-respecting when he is under the complete domination of his boss?"

"There's no domination about it, Black. A fellow can always talk to Stevens," Rogers announced with sureness.

"Granted. Yet a single worker going to the boss has only his labor to offer. Stevens owns the plants and has the cash. Thus, there is no bargaining equality between this fellow and Stevens. There can not be any such equality unless the workers join together in unions and bargain collectively with Stevens."

"Then," Rogers began with a sense of alarm as he leaned forward in his easy chair, "you've reduced it all to a dog-eat-dog affair. Jesus told people to help one another, not to grab for bargaining equality and the material things of life."

"I don't believe Jesus wanted one man, no matter how kind, to have all the power in a factory. Unions provide a needed check on the power of the factory owner. And unions just try to carry out the Constitution, which guarantees freedom of speech and assembly. Unions act on a law passed years ago by Congress saying that workers had the right to join the union of their own choosing and to bargain collectively."

"Now be honest with me, Black," Rogers said patronizingly. "You know perfectly well that unions restrict the workers' freedom."

"In a few cases, yes. Like in churches or lodges, the control of a union may fall into the hands of selfish men and the workers suffer. But in the main, labor unions help the workers have greater freedom. Through unions they can let their desires be known to the management; they can fight for better wages, hours and working conditions. They obey the rules of their own union because they, and not the management, make them."

"Yet no employer likes unions," retorted Rogers.

"Some do. They find it far more satisfactory to have union grievance committees. The worker with a complaint takes his problem to the proper union representative. The latter takes all 'beefs' that can't be settled right on the floor to the responsible representative of management, and it is worked out in terms of certain well-defined relationships. If necessary, an elected union committee can go all the way to the factory owner with a problem and deal with him man to man, since one represents all the plant in which the other works; the other represents all the labor that works in the plant."

Rogers paused, arose from his seat and strolled to the window. "You're getting a little too technical for me, Black. Let's get back to the Gospel in our discussion. Let the church be the church by bringing men to Christ, by helping them to live unspotted from the world, and then all our union problems would be solved. Spiritual, not material, questions are our main concern after all." Rogers with his back toward Joe was looking out at the sky.

Joe moved uneasily and cleared his throat. "The trouble with me, Brother Rogers, is that I can't separate material from spiritual questions. A boy in our textile town stole a loaf of bread the other day, after his father was fired from the mill and his family was hungry. A woman sold her body to a stranger so that her child could eat. Calling the boy a robber and the woman a whore doesn't go to the heart of the matter. Their spiritual sinning had some material causes. You can't separate low wages from the spiritual welfare of the victims and the moral health of the whole community. Hence left to a man spiritually, the church has to say something and do something about bad schools, low wages, strike breakers, the right to organize, adequate recreation, freedom of speech, class and race discrimination, and the like.

Rogers sat down. "Then, Black, you leave out completely the need for conversion and a sense of responsibility for sin a man or woman commits."

"Oh, no. Without good and unselfish members unions won't get anywhere. It's only people with love in their hearts who can set the world aright. Conversion must be put in terms of loving God by bettering the world we live in."

"Then, why do you defend these outsiders — these selfish, unconverted organizers who are coming here only to stir up trouble?" Rogers was almost preaching now.

"These so-called agitators make little headway unless workingmen have real and pressing grievances, Brother Rogers. These 'outsiders,' as you call them, are not as much outsiders as members of the Stevens mills Board of Directors who live in New York and whom Dave Stevens consults monthly."

"I still don't like the outside element. Now get me straight. I don't take any stock in the rantings of this Evangelist Smith against the Jews. That's Hitler's game of diverting the attention of working people from their real troubles to the hatred of some minority. But I don't like outside organizers telling the Stevens mill workers what to do."

Joe leaned back in his easy chair thinking of a suitable answer. Finally he replied, "At the request of a small group of millhands in this town the organizers were sent here by an organization representing textile workers all over America. Organized workers elsewhere know that their very jobs and wages are threatened by the high-hour, low-wage conditions in this and other southern mill towns. Workers have to stick together in some national organization."

"Not entirely. The Negro and the white worker in the South at least have little in common. One tries to get the other's job," declared Rogers strongly.

"But suppose Negro and white workers organized together for expediency's sake, to say nothing of the cause of brotherhood?"

"That will never happen. White workers are afraid. . . ."

"Sure they're afraid of each other, after these long years of segregation." Now Joe was preaching. "Competition among the races has kept wages down. But the informed white workers know that they must join with Negroes in unions for the common objectives of jobs, security, good pay. As the spokes of a wheel draw closer together nearer the hub, so workers, with their eyes on common objectives obtained through cooperation, will draw closer together, and their differences of race or religion will appear far less important."

For the first time, Rogers seemed to be moved by Joe's earnestness, "Behind your faith in unions, Brother Black, seems to lie a conviction that unions are somehow good for workers religiously."

"True. Unions give hungry souls a sense of belonging. That's now lacking in the mill village. Most of the workers are elbowing each other for a high seat at the table and each is seeking favors and special privileges from the boss. The unions will bring, in Christian terms, a sense of community. They will help men cooperate."

"Closer together for what — for violence and strike?" Rogers shot back.

"No, I hope not. But it's certain trouble will come if the management refuses to recognize the union, for almost every intelligent worker in that mill has years of stored-up resentment against the company. The question is: Will that resentment be channelled into violence and bad feeling, or into the workers' demands for fair play. With the union, gone will be the day of company spies, black lists, yellow dog contracts, company unions."

"But will the community benefit by the coming of the union?", Rogers asked earnestly. "After all, labor isn't the only group to be considered."

"Certainly. The workers will have more income to buy from the local merchants, to pay out in taxes for school buildings and better roads. They'd be self-reliant — no longer charity cases."

Rogers paused, and put his hands over his eyes as if the new rain of ideas from Joe was too much for him. "You're too idealistic and blinded by your enthusiasm. Tell you what I'd like—to meet this organizer, Jones. I want to see how really altruistic he is."

Rogers Begins to Understand

"I am for fair play, began the Rev. L. B. Rogers, as he addressed Pat Jones, Fred Styles, and Joe Black, assembled the next morning in his comfortable study. "I'm for justice, but considering all I read about unions in the papers and hear about town, I'm a hard man to convince. I don't know much about the factory for I've never been beyond Dave Stevens' office, but I'm for justice. Now tell me, Mr. Jones, what's to prevent the workers from getting cheated by the union?"

"Well," replied Pat, surprised at the precision of the minister's question, "all locals in our international union operate under a uniform constitution which has provision for nomination and election of officers, audited accounts, recall of offers and so forth."

"Glad you are so business-like. With such efficiency you must be able to pay your organizers big salaries."

"Not judging by my third-rate hotel room in town. I've found that organizing is far from a lark. It's heart-breaking. Some folks don't want to be helped. Some who sign up think all problems are solved by a union, and thus when something goes wrong they begin to talk about the good old days when the boss told them what to do. But try as I will, I can't get away from organizing. It's sort of a call, as you preachers term it."

Joe Black then added jovially, "This fellow sounds like Moses in the wilderness trying to lead the children of Israel at a time when they were yearning for the fleshpots of Egypt."

"But I don't believe that even a Moses can force us preachers to take sides," Rogers stated sharply. "We should remain neutral in industrial conflicts and judge each side impartially. The church should reconcile classes. Taking sides would split the church."

This was Joe's chance. He asked quickly, "If a company won't bargain collectively in good faith, how about justice? Reconciliation has to go with justice."

"All right now, Joe, let's be specific," Rogers interjected, trying to put Joe on the spot. "Just how would you remain a Christian and still take the part of the strikers?"

Joe shot back: "First, I'd offer my church if the strikers didn't have a place to meet. Second, I'd let the whole community know how Protestant denominations, the Catholic Church, and the Jewish congregations stand on labor questions. Third, if injustice were done the workers, I'd let the people know about the messages of the prophets — Amos, Isaiah, Micah and Jeremiah. I'd meet with the town and county officials, the governor and federal officials if necessary, to see if the strike could be settled to the satisfaction of both parties. And I might walk on the picket line if that doesn't work."

This time it was Rogers who remained calm. "You'll never lose your cutting edge. Remember, though, there are two sides to every question. You can't give the union leaders a blank check anymore than I can give Dave Stevens one."

"In that at least we agree," Joe remarked, turning to Fred and Pat with a twinkle in his eye. "No union man is going to tell me what to preach from the pulpit."

"Now that's not going to happen," Pat interjected. "We trade union fellows, if we win at the mill, need sympathetic critics — not yes men."

"Sort of occurs to me," Fred remarked philosophically, "that in your discussion you fellows forget that here in the South, the union folks are the church folks and vice versa. If the churches don't develop honest, loyal, self-critical members, you can't expect to have honest, loyal, self-critical union members either. There are some union leaders who think that if you give a man a better house and a high wage, he is automatically better. That ain't necessarily so. Give a man everything, and if nothing happens for the better inside his heart, then he's no better off." Rogers shook his head in assent and said no more.

"That's right," agreed Joe. "To me the church and the labor movement are like two huge circles which overlap. In this overlapping space is the common concern of both good churchmen and good union members of raising the economic level of working people everywhere — the sharecropper in Arkansas, the welder in Pittsburgh, the pecan picker in Texas, the hungry and starving all over the world. We are not alone in this struggle, for God's in the struggle for justice, decency and love. . . ."

Rogers Visits the Mill Owner

That very afternoon, Rogers walked into the office of Dave Stevens, the plant boss. As the two men seated themselves Stevens remarked tiredly, "Sit down, parson; I wanted to see you even though I'm fagged out. The Board of Directors has just thrown this whole union business into my lap — to recognize the union or not as I see fit. By the way, I heard the union leader has been trying to organize you. Did you throw that Red out?"

"Why no! We just had a good talk. He's okay."

Stevens seemed too lost in thought to hear Rogers' answer.

He continued, "With these union men around I wish I knew what was really going on at the mill. Using company spies would make the workers suspicious."

"Your high ideals might put you out of business yet, Dave."

"I reckon so, parson. But the Stevens never believed in slavery. Great Grandfather Stevens was one of the few planters in this region who gave his slaves the chance to earn their freedom. He never got rich. His great grandson won't either. If my competitors cut wages much more, I'm going out on my ear. I can't pay high wages, keep up the company houses so nicely, put a new roof on Preacher Black's church, and still. . . ."

Rogers interrupted abruptly, "And still being a Christian might pay off if you were even more of a one."

Stevens was dumfounded. "What do you mean?"

Rogers looked Stevens in the eye. "To be frank, why don't you swallow your pride, quit playing God to your workers? Let them run their own affairs. And then when the union organizes your competitors, they'll be forced to pay as much for their labor as you do."

"Now get me straight, parson. I don't oppose unions as such. But I don't like unions where the workers are dictated to by outsiders." Dave Stevens was emphatic.

"From what I learned yesterday, only on matters that have to do with stabilizing the industry and standardizing wage scales would you deal with the national union. On local problems, you'd have a plant committee to deal with you or whomever you appointed to iron out the difficulties on the spot. With a union, Dave, you'd know what was going on at the plant — without spies."

"I'll bet the union, if it wins, will choose its most loud-mouthed member as president," carped Stevens, obviously back-tracking.

"If you promise to keep it a secret, I'll tell you who will probably be elected president. It's Fred Styles."

"Gosh, he'd be letting me down! Why, for the past twenty years we've given him steady work." Stevens was wrapped in thought again. "Maybe he's organizing, though, because the company might not have as kind a manager as myself in the future. Security reasons, you know."

Quickly, Rogers asked, "Now, Dave, to get to the point, are you going to recognize that union?"

"Well," Stevens hesitated, "there's nothing else to do — if the union wins the election. The law says. . . ."

"Good," Rogers smiled as he held out his hand for a farewell handshake. "By the way, you'd better drop in on that old Pie-in-the-sky, Preacher Smith, down there on the lot across from your mill. A little brimstone of Smith's is good for the system nowdays. See if that's the kind of Christianity you think people ought to be taught. And if you do" — Rogers was smiling again — "guess we'll have to hunt a new Sunday School superintendent to take your place."

A New Era in Millville

In the plant election the union won by a large election. A contract was soon negotiated. That night Rogers, Joe, Pat, and Fred met together at Joe's home.

"Say," asked Pat jovially. "Who put the skids under that evangelist Smith just before the election?"

Rogers leaned back in his seat and slyly remarked, "It was none other, Mr. Jones, than your devil incarnate, Dave Stevens. For obvious reasons he hired Smith four weeks ago. But one night last week he heard the type of message he was preaching, and decided that Smith's exit would be good riddance to the churches and the whole community."

"That's hard to believe, Mr. Rogers," Pat said slowly, shaking his head in wonderment. "But to ask another question, did any union members join your church lately?"

"Not a soul, Mr. Jones. In fact one of the foremen resigned because I supported the calling of an election. I supported this measure because I thought it was right — not because it might bring in union members to my church. After all, it would be no more sensible, in my opinion, to support schools and hospitals purely for the reason that some teacher or nurse might sign up on the rolls."

Old Fred flicked the big cigar presented to him by the union membership following his election as president. The big cigar made little Fred a little dizzy, but very thoughtful, and finally he remarked philosophically, "Ministers and union men — we four — have just cooperated. Let's keep it up. Let's get ministers and shop stewards together so they can understand one another. Now maybe the best way is to have a social gathering of ten clergymen and an equal number of labor men."

"Sounds good," said Pat. "Yet how do we get started?"

"First, I'd suggest that each side get off its pet gripes against the other," Joe began with a twinkle in his eye. "I can just see a portly parson getting up there and saying, 'You labor men have too many labor gatherings on the Lord's Day, especially during church time. You condemn the clergy without knowing the clergymen personally or appreciating the difficulties of a well-meaning parson in a conservative church. If you want to change the church, gentlemen, get into it. And finally, I'm scared to death of you labor men who seemed to be interested in us clergymen so long as we can advance your cause, or your union. How about the whole community?' "

Pat retaliated quickly, "And I can just see some burly shop steward reply in these words, 'Gentlemen, don't you realize that we labor men haven't been considered part of our milltown community? We're never asked to speak at civic functions, serve on community chest drives. We want to be part of the town, but you and the other ruling powers simply haven't let us.'"

"I hope that such a meeting won't be just a series of complaints," volunteered Rogers. "Maybe the best way for the clergy and workers to get their eyes off their differences is for them to work together on some common community project — say a community forum, a housing survey, the construction of a playground. And by the way, Mr. Jones, maybe you could come over to our church and talk to our men's club someday."

"Would be glad to. And maybe you could come down to our next union meeting, and give some of the greenhorns in the local much-needed instruction in parliamentary law."

"I want Pat to come to my church too, Rogers," Joe remarked. "Maybe he could show us what is meant by judgment beginning in the House of the Lord in relation to the janitor's wages and hours, the printing of denomination publications in a union shop in order to put in practice the denominations' frequent verbal endorsement of collective bargaining."

"And we unions could learn a little about cleaning up our backyards first too," replied Pat.

The four men were finally silent. Rogers declared, "You know, I'm beginning to like you all. What all ministers and labormen need is more fellowship and facts and the Christian Gospel."

Dear Mr. Uphaus:

Thank you for your letter of February 12. It was indeed a fine thing for Dr. McMains to invite Dr. George Kelsey to occupy his pulpit on Interracial Sunday. This sort of thing is all too rare, particularly here in the deep South.

I am pleased to have the mimeographed report of your recent conference. I regret very much that a heavy schedule of activities prevented my attending, except for a portion of one session. I understand that it was a very successful conference.

With all good wishes,

Dear Dr. Johnson:

On Inter-Racial Sunday just passed, Witherspoon Dodge and I attended morning service at the First Christian Church where Dr. Harrison McMains is minister.

With Christian courage and boldness, Dr. McMains had decided to have the appropriate message for the day put into practice. He had invited into his pulpit Dr. George Kelsey, a Negro minister, who teaches religion at Morehouse College.

The service was so wholesome, so inspiring, at times so moving, and throughout so completely Christian, that I am prompted to take this means of bringing it to your attention. We felt that we had witnessed and shared in an experience where history - Christian history - had been made.

No doubt you, like we, have been much troubled by the fact of unChristian forces now challenging the manifest will of God as to right human relations in our state. I find my thoughts dwelling on how powerful an impact could be made upon the Christian consciousness of our people if services similar to that conducted by Dr. McMains were held widely throughout Georgia. So deeply do I feel this that I find myself impelled to lay this suggestion upon the hearts and minds of my brethren in the ministry. Could not the denominational and joint-ministerial bodies designate a Sunday when such services might be held widely in Georgia in the near future?

My Christian hope and faith to this end are prompted by a most rewarding southwide conference of our organization last week at the Butler Street YMCA in Atlanta, where ministers of all faiths and of both races met in fraternal fellowship with other children of God to advance the cause of divine justice in human relationships.

Sincerely and fraternally yours,

Willard Uphaus

RECEIVED APR 14 1947 Southern Regional Council

March 29, 1947

Dear R - L Member and Friend:

"Looming like a shadow over us is the potential threat of war inherent in the 'Truman Doctrine'." This was the reaction of our General Executive Board at its New York meeting, March 26th, to the President's proposal to circumvent the United Nations and pursue unilateral economic and military intervention in Greece and Turkey.

We believe America should do more than ever out of her abundance to feed the needy peoples of the world, but this must be done on a non-political and non-military basis and through the proper agency under the United Nations.

The present maneuver by the President and Congress is likely to be pushed through before the people realize the full implications. The policy looks unsavory from every angle. Could it be that we are more interested in protecting the Eastern oil interests of our billion dollar corporations? Is it part of a scheme to foment an anti-Russia hysteria? Are we really concerned that the Greek people enjoy democratic freedom, and the wholesome development of their industrial and agricultural life? The answer to this question is certainly, NO! If we were, our financial assistance would be given only on condition that the bankrupt Greek monarchy and the totalitarian regime in Turkey get off the backs of the people.

Here is an issue of great moment to Religion and Labor. As workers we are concerned with the welfare of workers everywhere in the world. We are ONE WORLD. From the standpoint of an ethical religion, we are burned up over the dishonesty and hypocrisy in our nation's policy, which is poorly concealed behind a cloak of high-sounding phrases.

If you agree with us, will you:

1. Write to President Truman.
2. Write to your Representatives and Senators.
3. Write to Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg, Chairman, Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and Representative Charles A. Eaton, Chairman, House Committee on Foreign Affairs.
4. Make the matter the subject of discussion and resolution at church and union meetings.

The forces in Congress and in the country supporting capitalistic imperialism and anti-labor legislation, and opposing the confirmation of David Lilienthal, are part of the same pattern. They are not reconciled to democracy, whether at home or abroad. The signs are ominous! Time is short! Make your convictions felt.

Fraternally yours,

Willard Uphaus

Pittsburgh Conference Charges Protestants With Heavy Responsibilities

Legislation Listed Among Subjects for Concern

Close to four hundred delegates representing twenty-seven different denominations responded to the call of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America to attend its first National Conference on the Church and the Economic Life in Pittsburgh, February 18-20. With few formal addresses and a maximum of discussion spokesmen from industry, labor, agriculture, the professions and the Cooperative Movement spotted issues, fixed responsibilities and outlined program.

Now that a reactionary Congress is bent on "doing something about Labor," Economic Justice calls particular attention to the proclamation on legislation.

"Local, state and national legislation is a major method of bringing about social change through the democratic process. The complex nature of the legislative process and of economic problems makes it difficult for Christian citizens to evaluate and support or oppose legislative measures. Therefore, the various church bodies, denominational and inter-denominational, should watch legislation and provide information for church people on issues which have implications for the Christian conscience. Furthermore, Christian people should be encouraged to participate in the political and legislative process. WHEN THE MORAL ISSUE IS CLEAR, OFFICIAL CHURCH BODIES SHOULD NOT HESITATE TO SPEAK ON LEGISLATIVE QUESTIONS. (Capitals Ours)

The moral issue is clear in Washington. Christians are taught that honesty is a cardinal virtue. The present flood of measures dealing with labor is based on obvious falsehoods. It is time to enforce the Pittsburgh proclamations, not only with research and publications, but with public meetings that expose these falsehoods. We list four of them:

1. It is charged that unions are monopolies, and that therefore industry-wide bargaining must be prohibited. The enemies of labor know that the anti-monopoly slogan falls on ready ears, for Americans do oppose monopoly. They confuse the real anti-monopoly fight by making it appear that organizations of working men and women are just as dangerous as the giant trusts and international cartels. In truth, industry has set the pattern for industry-wide bargaining, and unions had no other recourse if they were to exist. Reducing unions to local bargaining with individual units of great corporations, as Sen. Ball's bill intends, would mean the return of company unionism and general chaos. Protest against S. 133.

2. It is charged that the closed shop is Un-American. This falsehood is perpetrated on the public, despite the fact that this type of contract has come to predominate in the leading industries, such as steel, clothing, fur, rubber, textile, printing, maritime and electrical, and also has the endorsement of large sections of management. The closed shop is based on the established American principle that those who share in benefits should share in responsibilities. The check-off was in vogue long before unions called for it as a form of security. Americans who have just filled in their income tax blanks found themselves in the biggest closed shop of all. Protest against S. 105.

3. We need a cooling-off period before strikes. This lie is based on the

"Truman Doctrine" Leads To War, RLF Board Holds

Circumventing United Nations Called Ominous Step

The General Executive Board of the Religion and Labor Foundation meeting in New York, March 26, condemned the "Truman Doctrine" in relation to Greece and Turkey. "There can be no dispute about sending aid to the needy people of these countries and elsewhere, but the sending of military missions and funds for military purposes is a step toward war," the resolution declared. "Equally ominous is the circumventing of the United Nations and the taking of unilateral action by the United States."

As a peace program the Board adopted the following: (1) support of the Pepper-Taylor resolution, which will put the Greek-Turkish situation into the hands of the United Nations; (2) strong demand for universal disarmament, as embodied in the Tydings resolution; (3) support of the United Nations program for disarmament (this should include progressive reduction of armaments leading to a ban on all weapons, including the atomic bomb, and the elimination of the veto power); (4) support of the Landis Resolution (successor to the Martin resolution) which calls for the world-wide abolition of universal conscription; (5) vigorous opposition to any form of universal military training in the United States .

BOARD ELECTION RESULTS ANNOUNCED

At the meeting an announcement was made of the results of the election of Board members. The following twelve persons were elected by the RLF membership for a period of three years, beginning, January 1: Dr. Dwight J. Bradley, author and consultant; Rev. Allan K. Chalmers, minister, Broadway Tabernacle Church, New York; Dean W. J. Faulkner, Fisk University, Nashville, Tenn.; Dr. Sidney E. The Nature of the Christian Life

By GEORGE KELSEY

The world into which Christianity was born was one in which the problem of the improvement of life was a matter of primary concern. Great social and political dislocations had taken place; and people everywhere were gripped by a sense of insecurity and loneliness. The desire for salvation and better life was widespread.

Several religions and philosophies were on the field, all claiming to have the answer to the problem of human existence. One of these philosophies sought to improve life by inculcating inner self-sufficiency. In very much the same manner as we sometimes do today, these teachers advised people to live by reason and not allow their emotions to run away with them. If misfortune is yours, they said, do not weep; on the other hand, if fortune is yours, do not exult. Just remain calm, serene, and sufficient within, being governed only by reason. In this manner the good life is assured. For you will be living in accordance with the universe, since the universe is itself governed by Reason. Among the life improvement movements which appealed most to the masses were the mystery religions. The ceremonies of these cults were characterized by drama and pageantry. The novitiate was conducted through an apprenticeship and certain preliminary rites of purification. At last he was initiated and given a secret ritual which was supposed not only to guarantee a blessed existence in the life to come but to provide for better living in this world. Most advanced among the religions of the day was the religion of Judaism. This was a region of law and sacrifice. The Jewish scribes advised people who would improve their lives to adhere rigidly to the Law and the tradition of the elders. If you would improve your life, they said, obey the Law and sacrifice in the Temple.

"At length Jesus came and, as it were, startled the world with a new pronouncement. Instead of merely suggesting ways to improve life, Jesus pointed continuously to the end of this life and the birth of the new. While other religious and philosophical teachers sought to show the way to better living, Jesus went about heralding the coming of the New Age and advising people to prepare for it, not by a mere improvement of their lives, but by a complete right about face. The theme of his message was 'Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.' To Jesus it was not merely a matter of eradicating the impulses or subordinating them to reason; even the reason needed to be redeemed. It was not merely a matter of inner self-sufficiency; the self could never be sufficient. It was not merely a matter of ceremonial purification and the practice of ritual; it was a matter of a new heart. It was not merely a matter of obedience to the Law; the Law must be fulfilled."* The fellowship which centered its life in Jesus was not fundamentally a life improvement association; it was a new life movement. This is a fact which the churches have tragically forgotten. This is the point of the great deviation and cultural accommodation.

The message of the new life is indeed the fundamental message of the New Testament. The New Testament as a whole looks forward to a great cleft in life. The New Testament does not tell us how to improve our democracy; it tells us that our democracy must come to an end, for the very principles upon which democracy is founded are impure. The New Testament does not tell us how to win the four freedoms; it tells us that our ideal of freedom must be destroyed, for it is a mixed ideal. Herein lies the genius of Christianity. Christianity knows that in this life the good is bound up with evil. So that even when man enunciates and projects his ideals, he places himself at the center of those ideals. The cultural good is never an unmixed good. Is there any nation in the world today that is seeking real peace? No. It was quite obvious to all of us that the Germans sought peace according to Germany. But it ought to be just as clear that England now seeks peace according to England, that Russia seeks peace according to Russia, and that America seeks peace according to America. When the heavenly choir sang of peace, they always joined it with good will. But the nations today seek a peace which will allow them to preserve their old attitudes, patterns, and relationships. Instead of peace and good will they

Dr. Kelsey, who heads the Department of Religion in Morehouse College, Atlanta, was the preacher on Interracial Sunday at First Christian Church in that city. We are pleased to publish the sermon in full.

Foundation's Activities Show Growth

"Religion and Labor are becoming natural and necessary allies in the common fight for social justice and economic freedom," said Executive Secretary Willard Uphaus in introducing a report for 1946 to a meeting of the General Executive Board, in New York, January 21. "That the Religion and Labor Foundation has become an effective channel through which the ideals of progressive churchmen and labor representatives find expression in fulfillment of their mutual ideals is evident from progress made."

Dr. Uphaus made his report under the following heads:

Religion and Labor Fellowship and Action in Cities. Churchmen and labor organizers, representing the major faiths and the various branches of labor, are forming local organizations that meet regularly or when community situations demand. This movement is now continental in scope. Among the cities in which real R-L achievements are on record are: Atlanta, Cincinnati, Calgary, Chicago, Columbus, Dayton, Detroit, Indianapolis, Jackson, Michigan, Louisville, Knoxville, Los Angeles, Memphis, Montreal, Minneapolis, Nashville, New Haven, New Orleans, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Rochester, Rock Island, Seattle, Syracuse, Toronto and Vancouver. Secretary Willard Uphaus and John Ramsay, General Executive Board member and CIO Community Relations Representative, have met with groups in numerous cities not mentioned, including important points in the South. The New Haven and Toronto organizations now employ executive secretaries. Local activities include: radio, conferences, public forums and hearings, news releases, telegrams and letters, assistance in strike situations and organizing campaigns, exchange of speakers, picketing and literature distribution, work on social and labor legislation.

Seminary Students in Action. The Foundation has vital contact with forty seminaries, and its materials reach many more. Active chapters in fifteen schools get students into labor meetings, bring labor speakers to the campus, raise funds for relief, picket and distribute literature. The annual meeting in 1946 was held in November in Atlantic City. Students who realize that the church and synagogue must relate themselves to the present scene and help build a new economic order, are taking courses to obtain perspective and action technics A spiritual contribution can best be made through open identification with workers.

The Fourteenth Anniversary Dinner in New York. The Fourteenth Anniversary Dinner was held in honor of our Honorary President, Bishop Francis J. McConnell. The Honorable Nathan Strauss presided. Dr. Stephen S. Wise, Van A. Bittner and Kermit Eby were the speakers. AFL Representative Thomas A. Murray of New York, who was unable to attend, sent a greeting. The Foundation was honored by the presence of representatives from 42 religious and labor bodis. A distinguishing feature was that rank and file union speakers rose at their tables to make pleas for their respective causes.

Action in the South. A special subvention made is possible to set up programs in some of the southern states and prepare for our first Southern Religion and Labor Conference in Atlanta, February 4-5, this year. Two hundred delegates gathered for two days —men and women, Negro and White, clergymen, organizers, young people—with the common aspiration to spell out brotherhood in a region filled with hates, fears and injustices Representatives of the major faiths and branches of labor were present. Six work shops outlined programs of action to be reported to our membership in pamphlet form.

Headquarters Activity. 1. Telegrams, resolutions, letters; 2. Conferences with students; 3. Help with students' papers and research; 4. Supplying materials to city and seminary branches; 5. Hundreds of personal letters; 6. Maintaining relationships with cooperating agencies; 7. Providing speakers; 8. Special cultivation of social action departments of denominations, and city and state councils of churches.

Economic Justice has become an 8-page bulletin published ten times a year. The Foundation issued its first basic pamphlet, "Walking Together—Religion and Labor," with a statement of aims and program. Thirty-five thousand copies were printed.

The Detroit Conference. The Foundation joined with seventeen other national religion and labor bodies in a National Religion and Labor Conference in Detroit, February 25-26 with the theme: Religion and Labor—Allies for Freedom. It was a great demonstration of cooperation between unofficial social action bodies of various faiths and organized labor. Two hundred twenty-four registrants belonging to 21 different religious fellowships and 21 local, city and International unions, came from fifteen states, the District of Columbia and Canada. Twenty-five experts served as consultants for five workshops on: Interfaith Action, Racial Discrimination, Full Production and Full Employment, Freedom Through Full Access to Facts, and Freedom Through World-Wide Democracy.

The National Prize Winning Essay Contest. for senior high school students, on two subjects, "The Danger of Racial and Religious Prejudice in a Democracy," and "The Contribution of Trade Unions in a Democracy."

seek peace and prejudice, peace and suspicion, peace and power, in the final analysis, peace and war. The tendency of man to project his own interests and priorities into the center of his ideals is also seen in the world search for freedom. There are two outstanding versions of freedom on the field today—the Soviet version and the Anglo-American version. The Soviets are seeking to establish a freedom which will allow them to maintain dictatorship, communist imperialism and a collectivistic economy. The Anglo-Americans are seeking a freedom which will allow for the preservation of imperialism, racialism, and monopoly.

It is right at this point that the chief obstacle to the Christian life lies. This is the crux of the problem of the Christian life. We want the new life, but we do not want it enough to give up our old loves. We are not willing to part with established interests and values. Putting the matter in the language of many would-be converts, "If I become a Christian, what will I have to give up?" We find it impossible to face the fact that the new attachment involves an old detachment. Even on the night before the crucifixion Jesus' most intimate friends, the disciples, could not grasp this central element in the gospel. On this momentous occasion they raised questions concerning who is to have precedence in the Kingdom. Institutional and social positions meant so much to them in this age that they simply could not imagine that such wonderful things were not a part of the Kingdom. In whatever manner men have conceived the new life they have always managed to make it little more than a glorification of present interests and values. When some of the tribes of the American Indians thought of heaven, they thought of it as the happy hunting ground. When the Jews of Jesus' time spoke of the age to come, they spoke of it as the new Jerusalem. I suppose that the average American, if pinned down to say exactly what he thinks heaven is, would describe it as the new New York.

In a similar manner men assume that the new life, which Jesus urged us to embrace here and now, is a mere improvement of our present lives. They assume that they can slide into the new life, as it were, carrying their priorities, present interests and values with them. But the message of Jesus is not fundamentally a message for the mere improvement of life; it is a message concerning new life. There is a radical difference between improved life and new life. The Christian life is radical and revolutionary; it is not evolutionary and transitional. It involves a complete break with all things present, including even our idea of the good. The life which Jesus calls for is not a mere sloughing off of present ills and a reinforcement of present strong points. The present life must be brought to an end as a whole in order that the new may be born. Jesus makes it perfectly clear that the new life involves a break even with the old idea of the good in those statements well known as the "But I say unto you" passages. Here he sets the new demand against the background of the Law: "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not kill. . . . But I say unto you whosoever is angry with his brother . . . will be sentenced by God . . . whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell-fire." Whosoever shall say, "Thou Nigger," shall be in danger of hell-fire. Whosoever shall say, "Thou Red neck," shall be in danger of hell-fire. Whosoever shall say, "Thou Dago," shall be in danger of hell-fire. "Ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time, Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths, But I say unto you, Swear not at all."

If the Christian life is fundamentally new life, involving a break with present values and ideals as well as present evils, one may well inquire if the Christian life is achievable. The answer is unsatisfactory. The Christian life is a process; it is not an achievement. No one completely achieves the Christian life. The saints are on the way; and they are always on the way, never reaching the infinite goal. One writer has pictured Christ and his church as a long parade. At the head of this parade is Christ who is also the band or music maker for the parade. The church is following Christ but is a great distance behind him, so far that the music can only be heard dimly in the distance. This is a description of every Christian in his relation to Christ. When we use the terms "good" and "bad," we are using terms which have meaning in human comparisons. But when we turn our gaze upon Christ we are at once aware of the fact that all of us are sinners, standing in need of redemption.

Russia and America: A Synthesis

JEROME DAVIS

Reprinted, with Permission, from February 26 Issue of Zions Herald

Mankind, ascending from the caves and jungles of his prehistoric past, has followed a long and tortuous pathway. Throughout the centuries, by dint of costly experience certain fundamental principles have been discovered. Among these are justice for all, individual freedom, government of the people, by the people, and for the people, and racial equality. No human society now existent has achieved the application of these fundamental principles to the social order.

In the United States we have a long tradition of individual freedom. The individual is protected by law. We are so jealous of the right of the individual that we often give him freedom to gain monopoly control of certain basic resources and in effect tax all of us for his benefit. This individual freedom permits billionaire corporations to control the employment of millions. At intervals America is rocked with cataclysmic convulsions throwing millions out of work and causing economic stagnation. In the last depression we reduced economic expenditure for education by over $2,000,000 per day. Millions of children were deprived of school.

INDIVIDUAL FREEDOM DENIED TO MILLIONS

Even today individual freedom which we so highly cherish is denied to millions of Negroes in the South. In Norfolk, Virginia, "for instance" if a Negro sits down in a street car beside a white person, the Negro is fined $50 or put in jail. Thousands of southern Negro girls have scant protection against rape or assault on the part of whites. Occasionally, as happened recently, two Negro women may be taken from an automobile and shot to death at the hands of a white mob, solely because they were present when that same mob shot their husbands. In a southern police station a Negro has been shot to death by an officer in cold blood and no one is imprisoned for the offense.

The United States has a tradition of democratic government. Our ideal is government of the people, by the people and for the people. To a considerable extent, we have genuine democracy. Unfortunately, in many of our southern states Negroes are denied effective political opportunities. In some of our western states financial interests exert the dominating influence on our governmental mechanism. It is said that in the state of Oregon, the railroads have tremendous power. Few laws opposed by the railroads and the dominating banks can be enacted. In spite of these abuses, the United States has come a long way in providing freedom for her citizens and genuine democratic government.

It must be remembered that the United States had her revolution as far back as 1776. Our forefathers were fortunate in having a virgin continent. Only a few Indians could dispute the control of that vast territory. Naturally, our Constitution stressed individual freedom, individual responsibilty and freedom of enterprise. As a result we built up the greatest production mechanism in all human history. Some 150 years later the Russian people had their revolution. Their objectives were the same as our forefathers'; the happiness and welfare of the people. But they did not have a virgin territory; instead they had a Tsar's tyranny. From 70 to 90 per cent of the people were illiterate. Seven per cent of the Tsar's privileged few controlled nearly all the basic resources. Ninety-three per cent of the people were poverty-stricken, diseased-ridden and ignorant. Under these circumstances, the Russian revolutionists swept away the whole rotten structure of the Tsar's tyranny and established the Soviet Union.

Since they did not have a virgin land, they nationalized the basic means of production and distribution. They tried to place the welfare of all the people first. The individual and his needs were subservient to those of the group. They thus established as a basic concept economic justice rather than individual freedom. They enacted social insurance laws. They abolished unemployment. They made all medicine free. They gave everyone vaca-

Where Two Streams Meet

Some notes on a trip taken by John Ramsay and the Editor in Georgia

By WILLARD UPHAUS

The R-L flame burns in many hearts. I know Religion and Labor are natural and necessary allies. This was true long before the RLF came into being, but the evidence accumulates in the South. John Ramsay and I, who have been visiting Columbus and Macon, Georgia, have found this to be so.

A colored Baptist pastor summed it up at a Columbus meeting when seconding a motion that his Association urge upon the entire Interdenominational Ministerial Alliance full support of the Foundation and the organizing campaign of labor. "The union is the thing, and with Jesus we can't fail." The simple declaration sprang from the deep religious intuition of the Negro race, and it did my heart more good than a long dissertation on church-labor cooperation. Scenes like this make you understand why the scribes and Pharisees, the doctors about religion, turned Jesus cold, and why his soul went out to the common people.

During the discussion on the motion a big colored worker and organizer rose to his feet: "Brethren, I want to tell you I am in a state of unreadiness." Is he going to fight the motion, I asked myself? He had been through hard Birmingham campaigns. "You know, you got to push your feet around a lot and you got to get the folks together . . . . to understand. Not time, yet, to blow the trumpet in Columbus. You know they marched around Jericho seven times and the seventh time they blowed a long blast and the walls come tumblin' down." I don't know what the professors would do with the Birmingham brother's exigesis, but what a wonderful way to prove that just a motion would not win a victory!

There was another reason why new hope inspired those Negro pastors that morning. At a recent meeting of the white Ministers Association, a courageous preacher by the name of John Winkler, had made a motion that at least quarterly colored and white pastors meet together. Another, Frank Robertson, seconded the motion. The vote was unanimous and a small interracial committee is now arranging a program for the first joint meeting.

The meeting was an outstanding climax to a night and a day in Columbus. John and I had come expecting that a get-together of leaders had been arranged, but found that a number of pastors were busy with the sad funerals of the victims of the terrible Atlanta hotel fire. So we looked them up one by one. The first was George Johnston, young CIO organizer whom we took to supper with us. George is a graduate of Alleghany College and has had a year and a half in the Harvard School of Administration. He is one more disillusioned young man who has little confidence in the church because he has found it indifferent to the needs of the people. After supper, we three went to our hotel room where we talked for hours. "My faith in God is gone," George insisted, as he, at the same time radiated the idealism that drove him to organize under-paid mill hands. At times George is shadowed by a big bully whom someone is employing to scare him. A few nights before we arrived, someone had given him a terrible blow on the back of the head which flattened him out on the sidewalk. He came to his senses just in time to see his assailant disappear into the dark. He had not met one friendly pastor and was sure not one could be found in Columbus. George likes to sing. He has been getting a real kick out of singing in the choir of the First Baptist Church, one of "the" churches in Columbus. "What will happen when they find out I am a CIO organizer?" he queried, with a burst of laughter. As we said goodnight, we asked, "Will you go with us in the morning to meet some preachers?" "You bet," was his quick reply.

Well, much happened. The following morning Reverend Winkler, who had made the motion calling for Interracial meetings, came to the hotel at nine o'clock. George was prompt. The four of us had a full hour together. There, again, two streams flowed together—Religion and Labor—preacher and organizer. Winkler, a strong-muscled young man, completely embodied your ideal of a working-man's spiritual leader. He talked about his miner relatives in West Virginia. I studied his face and hands. George leaned forward and poured his soul into a plea for unionization. "I understand. My people are working people, but I must minister to all. The union must be guided by Christian principles."

"We agree," we assured Winkler. I went on to argue that a good union, like any other useful form of group discipline, means greater personal liberty. "The workers must win freedom from want and fear so that their salvation will be complete," I added.

"I will help lead a local Fellowship," Winkler promised with determination, as he departed.

George said to John and me, "Why, I know by the way he buttons his coat he is okay." That was a new one on me.

At ten o'clock, Frank Robertson came in—youngish, smiling, stepping with an air of confidence. He is a Methodist who took his Yale B.D. in '42. He remembered me and the RLF Local there. Frank occupies a relatively free pulpit in Columbus. "Why, I preached a sermon right down here on race that I worked up for Professor Luccock and they thought up there it was plenty strong for the North." Frank and George found a lot in common. It was real fun to sit back and watch the interplay. At the close of our conference, Frank said: "Sorry we couldn't have a meeting this time. If you will come back January 7, I will set one up." George and he will work together.

At eleven o'clock, George went with us to the colored pastors' meeting, mentioned at the beginning. John was asked to speak and introduce George and myself. I simply bore witness to the fact that Jesus came to bring the abundant life and told how, from the beginning, Phil Randolph, organizer of the Pullman Car Porters, had been one of the founders of our Brotherhood which is fighting for justice and fair play, through organized labor, for all men regardless of race, color or creed. George made a fine talk, stressing the CIO'S freedom from discrimination. He pled for their help. "As a Christian, I feel—." I have now forgotten just what George "felt", but he was the same man who had, the night before, said he had lost faith in God. As we finally parted at noon, George could not forget Winkler. I feel certain an R-L Fellowship is going to emerge and that it will bring moral support to a young organizer who is being shadowed by the agents of powerful and, no doubt, respectable enemies of labor who want to terrify him into leaving town.

Columbus is the home of the infamous Parson Jack Johnson, racketeer publisher of "The Trumpet", one of the dirtiest, rabble-rousing sheets in the South. He is a wolf in sheep's clothing.

tions with pay. All industrial workers received old age pensions. In spite of the dire predictions on the part of the western democracies, the Soviet Union grew from nothing to gigantic stature. Today it is openly feared by Great Britain and the United States because of its great strength. Russia has become a symbol of an attempt on the part of the common people to establish justice for the masses of peasants and workers.

Russia also pioneered in racial democracy. In contrast to the imperialism of Great Britain and the racial inequality in our own southern states, she gave absolute equality to all races and people. To practice anti-Semitism was a penitentiary offense in the Soviet Union. If anyone shows discrimination against a Negro, he is imprisoned, or if a foreigner, deported.

Russia does not have individual freedom as we find it in the west. It is easier for the individual to be imprisoned unjustly if he is suspected of opposing the principles and practices of the dominant group. The monopoly of the Communist Party prevents the free play of opposition parties. It is easy to see that both Russia and the United States have not achieved the practical application of all the great basic principles which mankind has found to be necessary in its slow evolutionary growth. Neither of these two great countries has achieved practical application of certain great normal principles which the human race needs. Russia has pioneered in trying to bring more justice for all the people. It has abolished unemployment, making impossible the cataclysmic convulsions of prosperity and depression. The United States has pioneered in individual freedom, giving rights to the individual white citizen which few societies in all human history have attained. The Soviet Union more nearly exemplifies the principle of racial equality. It has neither the imperialism of Great Britain in India or South Africa nor the malpractise of the United States in its treatment of the Negro, America and the west have more nearly achieved the goal of political party only.

Both the United States and the Soviet Union are defective in being too militaristic. Both place too much reliance on war. Of the two, the Soviet Union has the better record. After her revolution she offered to disarm completely if the rest of the world would do likewise. At the present time the Soviet is again challenging the world with a proposal for disarmament, and it remains to be seen if the United States and Great Britain will genuinely accept the offer. The United States has a greater navy than all the rest of the world combined. She has the greatest air force in history. She is still manufacturing atomic bombs, although she has a stock pile which could blow up all the major capitals of the world.

ARE WE WILLING TO DISARM?

Time is running short for homo sapiens. Either we will do away with the feverish race for militaristic power, or we shall be destroyed. An important question is whether the United States and Great Britain will be willing to destroy their navies. On the surface it looks as though the Soviet Union would be genuinely willing to disarm if Great Britain and the United States will do so. But this would mean the reduction of our navy to a small task force. If the world is to make further progress we must learn how to prevent war. This involves taking risks through disarmament and a willingness to work with rivals and contradictory economic systems.

Both Russia and the United States are defective in not having as high moral and religious values as the human race now knows. The United States is one of the greatest materialistic societies the world has ever seen. The standard of success is largely determined by financial ability. Financial corporations dominate the economic order. Graft and corruption are rampant. Gambling, immorality and unfair practice are widely prevalent. One has only to turn to the hearings of the United States Trade Commission to see what some of our best firms have done.

For example. the Eversharp Company, late in 1946, was ordered to stop its deceptive advertising regarding the gold content of its fountain pens.

impression that unions rush into strikes without careful deliberation, and without taking full account of the effects on management, on the public and on the long-time interests of labor. There have been cases of foolhardiness, but they are the exception. Unfortunately, the press and the public show little interest in the long periods that unions at times must wait before management will even agree to sit at the table or in the intransigent resistance to labor's proposals once the negotiating begins. The Smith-Connolley law has proved that cooling-off legislation does not solve the problem of strikes. Such attempts to settle conflict simply raise the temperature of everyone.

Protest against S. 55 (Taft-Ball-Smith)

4. The Wagner Act is one-sided, labor's opponents say. Here is another attempt to raise a false issue. Of course when Congress passed the Act in 1935, it knew it had to be one-sided. Before the enactment of the law the great corporations formed a united front against labor, and the worker was helpless. The purpose of the Wagner Act was to correct, in part, a situation which was completely out of balance. Incidentally, the Act has been tender with the employer. No criminal penalties are attached to violations, and police wagons never back up to the employer's door.

We do not hold that labor legislation cannot be improved. The Murray Joint Resolution (S.J. Res. 22) calling for a Temporary Labor Relations Commission to make "a thorough study and investigation into the underlying causes of disputes between labor and management, including union and employer policies and practices, economic and other factors, etc." deserves careful consideration. This would provide for joint participaton on the part of government, management, labor and the public to make a sane appraisal of present legislative needs. Organized religion might have a powerful, although unofficial, influence. It is painfully obvious that the present foes of labor in their hysteria will have none of it. They are bent instead on stifling the unions and thereby encouraging the forces that lead to depression.

W. U.

Southern Conference Specific on Legislation

Report of Sixth Workshop, omitted from February issue of Economic Justice, in contrast to the disheartening retreat in the state capitals and Washington, affirms faith in the people and democracy. The report was prepared by Miss Margaret Fisher, Executive Secretary, Committee of Georgia, Dr. George Mitchell, Southern Regional Council, Prof. C. O. Bacote, Atlanta University, Myles Horton, Highland Folk School, Rev. W. P. Spofford, Jr., Church League for Industrial Democracy, and Austin T. Walden, Atlanta attorney.

Believing that principles are only made operative through specific programs of action, the Southern Regional Religion and Labor conference adopts the following legislative platform for its work during the coming year:

We heartily endorse legislation on the Federal and State level which seeks to guarantee every man's God-given right to work for we believe that every man has a basic right to a job. However, since labor relations are human relations, no adequate solution of labor-management problems is possible through restrictive legislation, specifically through anti-closed shop bills.

The right to work is not an absolute right but one governed by the rights of fellow workers. The right to organize and bargain collectively implies the right to use the required means for these purposes. But in our Southern states where a great number of employers consistently oppose unions or, at best, tolerate them, union security in the form of the Union Shop is a required means to attain a legitimate aim of organized labor, namely, security. Therefore, if we admit the natural right of workers to organize, we must not deny them a required means to exercise that right effectively.

The Union Shop, that is one in which the majority of the workers require all the workers to be members of a union, is a democratic institution. Majority rule is a fundamental principle in our democracy. To prevent the Union Shop on the pretense that it is unfair to the non-union minority is, in fact, an

Jesus himself indicated that the Christian life is a process rather than an achievement. Here the point may be illustrated by comparing Jesus and John the Baptist. When the soldiers inquired of John the Baptist what must be done to inherit eternal life, John the Baptist declared that they should bring forth fruit worthy of repentance. But, in another connection, Jesus said in effect that this cannot be done. Jesus said, when you have kept all the commandments, consider yourselves unprofitable servants. Christian duty in the full sense is never done. One level of moral achievement always calls for the next higher level.

What then does it mean to be Christian in the specific life situations in which we find ourselves? How can an individual be Christian under the harsh limitations and restrictions which nature and history impose upon him? Christian morality imposes upon us the necessity of acting on principles which the exigencies of the situation neither disclose nor dictate. While a Christian cannot act without reference to a situation, his action must never be determined wholly by factors in the situation. Being Christian, his action must always be determined primarily by a higher principle which is brought to bear upon the situation. For the Christian, the guiding and motivating principle of all action is the Law of Love. This principle must be applied even in situations and relations that are utterly foreign to the principle.

Christians are bidden to love their enemies. Practically, this means positive adventure toward breaking the barriers of hostility between oneself and another. It means going after an enemy to be reconciled with him. Being Christian toward an enemy involves forgiveness, not seven times, but seven times seventy. When Jesus said seven times seventy he was not enunciating a new legalism. This was a very effective way of saying, forgive indefinitely. A Christian will never allow the mind of the enemy to get over into himself. Rather, he will insist on dealing with his enemy on a higher plane than that on which his enemy deals with him. The Christian will not treat his enemy in this manner in order to bring his enemy around to loving him. This aim is but selfishness in disguise. The Christian loves his enemy because his enemy is the object of God's love. This was the sole reason which Jesus gave for loving one's enemies—"that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust."

How does one meet the requirements of the Christian life in the area of race relations. To be Christian in race relations involves the confrontation of members of other races as children of God and not as instances of types. Human relations are Christian when they are personal, when two souls —an I and a Thou—confront each other. When human relations are determined by race they are sub-Christian. For, to deal with a person as a member of a race is to deal with him as an It, as an object to be analyzed, categorized, manipulated, used, and even hated. He is not a person with whom one has fellowship, whose aspirations and sorrows one shares, whom one understands and loves. Fellowship and love can only arise when two souls enter into each other, when they become I and Thou. It is my duty then to confront a white man as a child of God. If I am a Christian he remains a child of God to me even if he insists on being determined by race from his side. The determinant of attitude and action for the Christian is the love of God which operates in his heart.

The revolutionary character of Christian morality is no less evident when we observe it in the area of personal life. If a man's besetting sin is drunkenness, he does not meet Christian requirements by merely moderating his drinking. The Christian demand is that he drink not at all. If a man's besetting sin is lying, he does not meet Christian requirements by merely shading his lies down to little ones. The Christian demand is that he lie not at all.

The Christian life is a radical and revolutionary life. It is not evolutionary and transitional. It is not a mere reinforcement of present strong points. It is not a glorification of present customs, standards and ideals. The Christian life is discontinuous with all things present. It is a life characterized by an outreach beyond all things immediate. It is a life of dependence upon and abandonment of the self to God. It is the life of God on the human scene. Jesus summarily described it in the words, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."

munity Church of New York; Rev. Leon Rosser Land, minister, Congregational-Unitarian Center, Flint, Michigan; Dean Walter G. Muelder, Boston University School of Theology; Frank W. McCulloch, director of Labor Education Division, Roosevelt College, Chicago; Miss Eleanor Neff, associate secretary, Woman's Division of Christian Service of the Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, New York; Ben Segal, educational staff, CIO Textile Workers Union, New York; Mr. Joseph Schlossberg, secretary-treasurer emeritus, Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, New York; and Rev. Charles C. Webber, president, Virginia CIO. Dean Faulkner, Dean Muelder, Mr. McCulloch, Miss Neff and Mr. Segal are new members of the Board.

The Board authorized the preparation of a 1947 basic pamphlet which will set forth the aims and program of the Foundation and help coordinate the activities of city branches and theological chapters in the United Statees and Canada. The chairman was asked to appoint an advisory committee representing the various faiths and branches of the labor movement that will meet and discuss the nature and content of the pamphlet.

injustice to the majority in the shop. The union members probably risked their jobs and certainly made sacrifices to get their union recognized, to obtain good wages and working conditions, and to maintain job security. For non-union workers to profiteer on these sacrifices by accepting the fruits and refusing to contribute, morally and financially is clearly unjust. And yet, the state is being asked to legalize this injustice.

As a further guarantee of the right to work, we recommend that Southern employers and Southern unions must re-examine and revise employment practices resulting in discrimination and should take steps toward the inclusion in their collective bargaining contracts the principles of "equal pay for equal work" and "equal opportunity to work."

We support legislation for full production and full and fair employment in industry and in agriculture. Full production is necessary for domestic well being and to feed and clothe a hungry and impoverished world. Your committee recommends: (a) endorsement and support of measures to raise the minimum wage standards of the Fair Labor Standards Act to an immediate 65c. and eventual 75c. an hour, and to liberalize the coverage to include all classes of wage earners engaged in occupations which affect commerce between the states.

b) The expansion and improvement of Social Security and the inclusion thereunder of farm workers, domestic workers and the self-employed.

c) Standards of child labor legislation on the state level at least equal to the federal provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

d) That payments under Unemployment Compensation and Workman's Compensation be increased.

e) That legislation for state wage and hour laws be introduced in the several states.

f) That a state Labor Relations Act providing guarantees for the exercise of concerted organization rights and collective bargaining for workers in intra-state industry be introduced in the several states.

g) We are deeply concerned by the already visible displacement of southern farmers and farm workers by mechanized farming. This movement is gathering momentum and in the foreseeable future millions of Southerners will be without means of livelihood.

Therefore, we request that State and Federal governments proceed at once to make plans and provisions for having these displaced persons in productive work, supplying land and tools for farming, jobs on reclamation projects and other needed funds to carry these hapless through the transition period.

Recognizing the likeness of God in every man of whatever race or color, upon which fact rests man's natural rights, and in consonance with the fundamental principles of our democracy, we proclaim our belief in the enjoyment of equal rights for all citizens under the laws of the land.

In keeping with said belief we hereby declare that there should not be any denial of the fundamental rights of citizenship to any segment of our people based upon race or color. Accordingly therefore, we condemn such unfair and unjustifiable devices as the white primary and the poll tax. While being unalterably opposed to the poll tax, we call upon the Church and labor leaders to cooperate in campaigns to persuade all church and labor members to pay their poll taxes, to register and to vote.

We call upon the Congress to enact anti-lynching legislation and to abolish the undemocratic filibuster.

THE DEMANDS OF RELIGION AND DEMOCRACY

Under the religious and democratic understanding of man, the full life for all men depends upon an environment which guarantees good and adequate housing, education, health facilities, social security and fair taxation based upon the individual's capacity to pay. We believe that it is the responsibility of democratically-elected governments on the local, state and federal levels to provide such a social environment for all persons by maintaining, strengthening and expanding present programs and by

a) providing good and adequate housing for all persons.

b) providing equal education opportunities for all persons in schools of the highest educational standards,

c) expanding social security programs so that all citizens are adequately

The American Tobacco Company was brought to bar on charges of misrepresentation in regard to its Lucky Strike cigarettes. Proctor and Gamble of Cincinnati was brought to a hearing because of misrepresentation of a liquid dentifrice. Practically every big advertising concern in America has been caught at one time or another. Recently, one of our largest chain stores, The Atlantic and Pacific, was convicted. The evidence covered 30,000 pages. The decision of the Federal Court was recorded in 117 pages. It found that the Atlantic Commission Company, a subsidiary, "exploited" its position. The government offered evidence to show that at least $2,000,000 was taken out of the pockets of A and P purchasers between 1935 and 1941 by such dishonest procedures as adding extra items on the bill when the customer came to pay or of charging more than the regular price. The A and P even paid for "wine, women and song" for lobbyists whom they brought to testify in Washington.

The Soviet Union is also free from graft and corruption. Factory managers occasionally manipulate so as to gain selfish advantages. Managers of collective farms sometimes steal from the group. But on the whole, it is probably true that there is much less corruption in the Soviet Union than there is in the United States and punishment is more drastic.

Both countries need more efficiency. The Soviet Union does not always achieve as great industrial efficiency as does the west, but it does not have the curse of periodic depressions.

From the facts already cited, it is apparent that both the United States and the Soviet Union have values which the world needs. Neither country has evolved a perfect society. Both countries can learn from the other. What is needed is a recognition on the part of the people of the United States and the peoples of the Soviet Union that they need to gain the positive benefits of the other and eliminate their own weakness. The world needs both the economic justice and the racial democracy towards which Russia has pioneered, and the individual freedom and government of, by and for the people which the United States is working to attain. If our radio and press would understand the proven fact that neither the United States nor the Soviet Union can afford to point the finger of scorn at the other, that this is like the pot calling the kettle black, and that on the other hand both countries need to study and learn from the other, then there is hope for building a better world.

This is a far cry from the present lofty superiority complex adopted by so many of our newspapers and radio commentators. Midnight is striking for the human race. Either we shall build a social order combining justice, racial equality with individual freedom and political democracy or else cataclysmic war will teach the human race the hard way. God has placed us in a world of potential abundance where we can have food, clothing and shelter beyond our highest dreams if we will follow the basic moral principles which the world already knows but does not heed.

For the sum which the United States spent in the late war, we could build a beautiful home for every family in the world, throwing in hospitals and schools for every community. The choice confronts our generation as to whether we will aid in building this world of happiness and beauty for all or whether we will continue our selfish rivalries and pretensions to superiority which inevitably lead to disaster and annihilation. The only road to human happiness is one of cooperation, friendship and understanding. Will we recognize the value other nations have to teach us or will we follow the myth of superiority over the abyss?

Macon is now a real place to me because of the day there. We arrived at five p. m. and checked in at the Dempsey Hotel. After a bit of rest and supper we took turns at the telephone locating leaders we knew or who had been recommended. Result—a luncheon meeting the following day with thirteen of the city's influential progressives, including Reverend Denney of the First Christian Church, a close friend of Jim Crain; Stewart Matthews, Episcopal Rector; Dr. Burke, retired missionary from China; Professor Avent, of Wesleyan College; Reverend Denham, leading Baptist; Tom Johnson, courageous lawyer, defender of the weak; Father Bryant; William (Pop) R. Smith, Editor of "The Macon News"; R. E. Starnes, CIO Sub-Regional Director who brought four staff members with him. The time was too short to locate AFL organizers but we were advised, at the meeting, that a few could be found who would be interested.

Lawyer Johnson was elected Chairman of the Committee to set up a larger meeting at a later time, when I was asked to return. Five members of the group volunteered to help. The people at this meeting were far more advanced than many we meet for the first time.

I had an hour with Johnson after lunch. He is 36, and a graduate of Mercer Law School, son of working parents. At graduation he took the long view. He made up his mind he would not sell his soul defending anti-labor corporations. There was little to eat, at first, but now he, wife and eight-year-old son are doing well. Little people who need protection find their way to his office. "When I get too discouraged I take a trip to the country, where I can be close to nature," he told me.

Elizabeth Stinson, active in the Methodist Federation for Social Service, and Director of Religious Activities, invited us to dinner. Wesleyan is the oldest woman's college chartered to grant degrees. It is beautifully situated several miles outside of town. The campus and buildings were designed as a unit. Everything looked fit, peaceful and orderly. It is a pretty sight to see four hundred Southern college girls together at dinner, especially with many in flowing evening gowns. We had the privilege of sitting at a faculty table surrounded by truly congenial spirits.

After dinner we listened to the college choir singing Christmas carols in the adjoining, perfectly appointed social hall. As they sang, "Oh Little Town of Bethlehem", "Joy to the World", and "Silent Night", my eye kept turning to the portrait of a dignified looking gentlemanon on the wall. Noticing me, a faculty member said: "I guess you wonder who he is?"

"Yes," I replied.

"Well, he is one of the richest men around. A textile operator who gave Wesleyan a lot of money. This hall is named for him." Lucy Mason had advised us that Wesleyan was much under the influence of the Textile interests. My mind was filled with conflicting pictures: Sweet girls, doubtless innocent and unaware of the fact that unorganized, underpaid, mill hands were really making their education possible, singing "Oh, Little Town of Bethlehem"; the NLRB meetings that very day in Macon when the evidence pointed to the intrigue of the Macon Textile Company and its fierce discrimination against Negroes.

Possibly you saw in TIME or some other source that a young Baptist minister at McRae, Georgia, has fired one of those shots that is heard around the world. A young Joseph Rabun was attending the Georgia Baptist Convention at Savannah. It happened that the Negro Baptists were meeting at the same time and in the same city. This convention was about to pass one of those pious resolutions on race when God inspired him to tell his brethren it was time to act. Rabun introduced a resolution calling upon the convention to meet with the Negro pastors. It passed. The meeting was held. It was short and probably perfunctory, but what a beginning for Southern Baptists! Example means more than words. The incident is the talk down here. Baptist Reverend Denham, after the Macon luncheon, told me in words weighted with meaning, "It is time we were doing something."

That afternoon, Tom Johnson introduced me to another Macon attorney, Harry Strozier, who has been a tower of strength to the Southern Conference for Human Welfare. Strozier showed me a three-page letter that Rabun had written "Pop" Smith, the Editor, revealing the reasoning and experience that led to this Savannah action. It is one of those documents that historians of a later date will need to tell their story.

When I returned to Atlanta I told Witherspoon Dodge, who is working in the Atlanta office with me, my story. I magnified our experience with George Johnston, who had given us vivid descriptions of mill communities and the hazards of our organizer. Witherspoon picked up the Bible on my desk and turned to Matthew 9:34-38. We read the verses together.

"And Jesus went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing every sickness and every disease among the people.

"But when he saw the multitude, he was moved with compassion on them, because they fainted, and were scattered abroad, as sheep having no shepherd.

"Then saith he unto his disciples, The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few.

"Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth laborers into His harvest."

Dear Friend:

According to a news dispatch the civil rights of an American citizen were outraged when a mob in LaGrange assaulted Wilbur E. Gupton, a member of the CIO's Southern Organizing Committee.

Assigned to an organizing task at Hogansville, Gupton and his wife had visited LaGrange, less than twenty miles away, for dinner in a cafe and to attend a movie. At the close of the show, while unlocking his car, Gupton was struck on the head and suffered a fractured skull.

This kind of hoodlumism is surely offensive to all Christians who believe that organizers who go peacefully about their work have the legal and moral right to do so. The right of free collective bargaining has been a part of the social teachings of the church for many years. We believe this kind of disgraceful attack on Mr. Gupton does not meet with favor among thoughtful Christians, for they know organized labor is improving the standards of living of working people and therefore bringing more buying power to the local community. Unfortunately, hoodlums do not understand either Christianity or economics, and care less. Unfortunately, also, they are sometimes inspired by the secret connivance of vested interests opposed to justice and democracy.

During tense days like these violence may occur any place in the United States. Wherever it breaks out, there is always something that ministers and Christian laymen can do. They can protest to public officials, and make these matters subjects of discussion in sermons and in Bible classes. Have you written a letter of protest to Gov. M. E. Thompson?

Yours for justice and peace,

Willard Uphaus

Dear Witherspoon:

I have written my Mississippi head man and asked him to consider earnestly what he and his friends can do in the Willie McGee case. It is not going to be easy to get anybody in Mississippi to act, partly because everybody in the State has been so flooded with angry messages.

But of course that doesn't relieve any of us from our duty to push hard for what is just.

Dear Mr. Long:

I have been pressed by friends to see whether a body of Southerners could be induced to talk with Governor Wright with a view to forestalling the execution of Willie McGee, now set (if I am correctly informed) for March 20.

I know, of course, how extremely difficult it is to get people to work on these cases in a reasonable way when so much that seems to us unreasonable has been said and done. Still, it is the case that the South's insistence on the death penalty for Negroes in cases of this kind, as against light penalty for whites, is unfair. And each such case is certainly made the most of by those who wish to demean American democratic institutions.

If in your judgment some approach to the Governor is feasible and proper, I do hope you will see what you can do.

I am certainly not interested in joining anybody else's tactics of mass pressure on the Governor. But it remains each Southern person's difficult duty to try to get even-handed justice -- pressure or no pressure.

The present claim is that there is new evidence never heretofore used in court that McGee and his alleged victim had kept up a relationship for several years before the incident.

Dear George:

I presume you are thoroughly conversant with this case of Willie McGee, in Mississippi. His wife is here, and I have met with her, Willard, some local ministers and others who want to do what they can.

I told them of your work and the SRC, and volunteered to write you at once. Willie's execution is set for March 20th. Can you corral a group of Southern preachers, church men and women, or others to see the governor of Mississippi about the case?

Drop me a line and let me know what the low down is.

I am also writing Jim Dombrowski, and Rev. Charles Hamilton at Aberdeen, Miss. Willard iswriting Mrs. Tilly.

The Case of Willie McGee

A Fact Sheet Prepared by the Civil Rights Congress

UNEQUAL JUSTICE

In Virginia, where seven Negroes from Martinsville were recently executed for the alleged crime of rape, no white man has ever been sentenced to death for this crime. Since 1908, 51 Negroes have been executed for rape. Similarly, in Mississippi, Negroes are "legally" sent to their death while white men convicted of rape get off with prison sentences or less. Further, rape by a white man of a Negro woman generally goes unpunished, no matter how terrible the crime. Even if such a crime involves a young child, the death penalty is never meted out to a white attacker. Within the context of this historical background, the McGee case must be viewed as a typical example of unequal justice.

THE PRESENT ISSUE

An innocent Negro, Willie McGee, is scheduled to die in the electric chair on March 20th in the town of Laurel, Miss. In this state a portable electric chair is used in order to hold electrocutions in the town where the alleged crime was committed.

THE MAN

Willie McGee, 36, is the father of four children, the eldest 11 years old. At the time of his arrest, he was working as a truck driver.

THE ALLEGED CRIME

A white woman, Mrs. Troy Hawkins, alleges that at 4 a.m., Nov. 3, 1945, she was assaulted as she lay in bed with a sick child asleep at her side. She did not cry out, she claimed, so as not to awaken her children and husband, asleep in an adjoining room. The alleged rape took place in total darkness. Mrs. Hawkins identified her attacker only as having "kinky hair" and wearing a tee-shirt. There were no signs of a struggle.

THE ARREST

Willie McGee was seized 30 miles from the scene of the rape that same day. He was held incommunicado for 32 days, during which police elicited a "confession" which McGee later repudiated, explaining that he signed it in order to remain alive. Speechless and helpless, he was carried into court after his 32-day incommunicado period and immediately went on trial.

THE TRIALS

First: On Dec. 6, 1945, while state militia armed with machineguns surrounded the courtroom and a hostile lynch mob threatened to kidnap McGee, attorneys pleaded for a delay so that McGee could recover from shock. This plea, and another to move the trial away from its mob-violence atmosphere, was denied. An all-white jury and judge convicted McGee after exactly two minutes of deliberation. Sentence: death.

The National Federation for Constitutional Liberties, now merged with CRC, intervened to appeal the case to the Mississippi Supreme Court. On June 10, 1946, the court unanimously threw out McGee's conviction and ordered a new trial on grounds that lynch atmosphere had unduly prejudiced the trial.

Second: On Oct. 7, 1946, as 100 militiamen tried to hold back a tense mob, the judge at McGee's second trial excused himself from the case and was replaced. So tense was the atmosphere that this second judge was forced to move the trial to Hattiesburg, Miss. McGee was spirited past a shouting mob and on Nov. 4, 1946, was found guilty by another all-white jury in Hattiesburg after a four-day trial. Sentence: death.

Again CRC stayed the execution by an appeal to the Mississippi Supreme Court which, on Feb. 9, 1947, again reversed McGee's conviction and threw out the original indictment on grounds that it had been brought by a grand jury from which Negroes were excluded. But a new district attorney in Laurel had just been elected on a campaign of rushing McGee to the chair.

Third: On March 3, 1948, after being re-indicted, McGee was retried before another all-white jury. Informed that they were in danger of mob violence, McGee's attorneys applied to the judge for protection. He refused to guarantee their safety and they were forced to flee, on peril of their lives, before the trial ended. Verdict, brought by a jury after 58 minutes: guilty. Sentence: death.

Scant hours before his scheduled electrocution, the CRC again saved McGee from death with an appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court. When the court refused, on Oct. 10, 1949, to take the case, CRC attorneys applied for a reconsideration of the appeal. The court rejected this on May 15, 1950.

ORDER ADDITIONAL FACT SHEETS AT 3¢ EACH FROM C.R.C., 23 W. 26th St., N.Y. 10, N.Y.

Once more Willie McGee's execution date was set, this time for July 27, 1950. Following world-wide protests and a dramatic delegation to the state capitol at Jackson, Miss. (see below), Supreme Court Justice Burton issued an eleventh-hour stay of execution to permit a new appeal by CRC. This the court subsequently refused in January of this year. On Feb. 3, 1951, the Mississippi Supreme Court set McGee's execution date at March 20th.

THE REAL STORY

Hitherto-unrevealed, new evidence is being presented by CRC attorneys in the coming legal appeals. Lawyers will present data to substantiate charges that: (1) Mrs. Hawkins and McGee maintained a relationship for several years prior to the alleged rape; (2) Mrs. Hawkins refused to release McGee from the relationship and stymied his attempts to free himself by threatening to cry rape and bring down a lynch mob on McGee's head; (3) the relationship was well known in the community, thus moving white supremacists to press feverishly for McGee's death; (4) Mrs. Hawkins lied when she claimed never to have seen McGee before the alleged rape.

This evidence has not been revealed before, even to CRC, because McGee's lawyer advised him that if the truth were told, McGee would be lynched immediately. The unwritten law of the white-supremacist South is this: a Negro who has relations with a white woman must die.

THE VICTIM'S WIFE

Throughout his six-year existence between life and death, Willie McGee has had the strong support of his wife, Rosalee, who never once wavered in her determination to free him from a vicious frameup. Speaking tirelessly on CRC-sponsored tours and at meetings, issuing moving appeals for support, Mrs. McGee has also had the responsibility of keeping her family of four together.

In her efforts to keep a job she has been discriminated against and mercilessly exploited by employers who took advantage of her because she was a marked woman, the wife of a man whose frameup has stirred international protest. With the help of CRC's Prisoner's Relief Committee, which assists the families of all jimcrow and political prisoners, Mrs. McGee has been able to continue her struggle with undaunted courage and loyalty. She is now available for speaking engagements.

THE MASS CAMPAIGN

Mobilized by CRC, a tremendous wave of public protests was aroused around the Mississippi frameup. From every country of the world, from most of the U.S., from people in all walks of life, from trade unions and religious groups, workers, civic leaders and professionals came wires, letters and resolutions of strong protests.

THE JACKSON DELEGATION

Highlighting CRC's determination to save McGee's life was a dramatic delegation composed of Northern and Southern men and women from 10 states who met in Jackson, Miss. during July, 1950, to urge Gov. Fielding Wright to free Willie McGee.

Members of the delegation and newsman Stephen Fischer of the Daily Compass were attacked and beaten by mobs incited by the local newspaper. Among the determined men and women of the delegation were Aubrey Grossman, national organizational secretary of the CRC and Sidney Ordower, Progressive Party candidate for senator in Illinois, both badly beaten; Mrs. Winifred Feise, a New Orleans white woman who gave the lie to white supremacist lynchers by refusing to "let them hide their crimes behind the skirts of southern white womanhood", and Prof. Gene Weltfish, of Columbia University, internationally-known anthropologist who laid bare the social causes of the great "rape myth".

The delegation had previously obtained an appointment to see the Governor. When they arrived for it they found he had set up a public hearing in the Chambers of the State Assembly, to which were personally invited all the important people of the State, and which was covered by an array of Southern newspapermen.

Within the two and a half hours alloted to the delegation for their presentation, various delegates shattered the flimsy frameup structure which was the legal basis for the judgment of execution. Moreover the delegation explained the real reason for such frameups and death sentences. It pointed out that such frameups naturally grow out of the system of discrimination and segregation which characterizes, but is not limited to the South; that such frameups are related to the almost complete disfranchisement of the Negro people who constitute 49% of the population of Mississippi; that it was no accident that Congressman Rankin, who comes from Mississippi, is the most articulate and vicious spreader of the Big Lie that Negroes are criminals and rapists; and that the old-type lynching has merely been supplanted by the just-as-common legal lynching, of which the McGee case is a typical example.

THE LYNCH SPIRIT IN MISSISSIPPI

Twice attempts have been made illegally to lynch Willie McGee. He faces such a threat today, especially if his legal battle shows signs of succeeding. The authorities must be forced to guarantee his personal safety.

Threats of violence also hang over the heads of any of McGee's defenders who go into Mississippi. The influential Jackson Daily News, which in July of 1950 stirred up the beatings of CRC delegates, is today calling in no uncertain terms for greater violence. One editorial states: "Any lousy, conscienceless lawyer who seeks to defeat the ends of justice in the Willie McGee case should be branded as a public enemy and treated as such." Another editorial headed "NOT SAFE FROM NOW ON" warns that the personal safety of McGee's defenders will not be guaranteed. In a vicious racist diatribe against a Negro editor in Jackson, the News threatens not to let his past work with CRC in the McGee case go "unnoticed". Such a remark, in the South, needs no further amplification to Negroes living in daily terror.

THE RESPONSIBILITY

Gov. Fielding L. Wright, of Mississippi, can be charged with an intractable determination to see Willie McGee killed. He has publicly refused to hear any protests on the frameup. More important, although he has the power to pardon McGee or free him immediately, Wright has steadfastly refused to do so. Considered the "brains" of the Dixiecrat movement, Wright ran as its vice-presidential candidate in 1948; his Jackson capitol is headquarters for the Dixiecrat newspaper. Although Wright represents an open attempt to suppress the Negro people, recent developments in the Martinsville Seven Case, where Virginia's governor and courts refused equal justice to Negroes, make it clear that Wright speaks for the entire South, not merely the Dixiecrat movement.

The U.S. Supreme Court, in thrice refusing to save McGee from death, condones Mississippi's crime of government and takes part in it. President Truman has direct authority under the Federal Civil Rights Act to order his Attorney-General to intervene on McGee's behalf. Since all legal action to save McGee will continue in federal courts, Truman can further instruct his Attorney-General to appear on McGee's behalf in these courts, as the federal government has sometimes done in the past. The federal government, which can sanction or overturn McGee's "legal lynching," has joined with Mississippi, as it did with Virginia in the Martinsville case, to perpetrate a crime against the Negro people.

THE MEANING-THE LESSONS OF MARTINSVILLE

Unlike most Northern states, the South views rape as a racial crime involving the "pollution" of the white race. Race murder based on such a theory is genocide, exactly paralleling Hitler's racist mass murder of the Jewish people. Whether committed with wholesale rapidity, as in the case of Nazi Germany, or by slow, steady degrees, genocide is clearly defined by the Allied War Criminal trials at Nuremburg and later by the UN Declaration of Human Rights. Slow race murder by legal and illegal lynching of the Negro people is, within these definitions, clearly genocide.

Illegal lynching has decreased in the face of vigorous opposition. But "legal" lynchings like those of Martinsville or the attempts on McGee, Mrs. Ingram and the Trenton Six, have supplanted mob violence as part of an official government policy of terror. Legal lynchings are perpetrated by the police arm of the government's administrative branch, upheld by the legislative branch which refuses to outlaw jim crow terror, and allowed to continue by the judicial branch which declines to intervene.

The policy of legal lynching is not peculiar to the South, as witness the Trenton Six case. It is not solely a state matter; for example, Lt. Leon Gilbert was persecuted by the federal government, whose FBI also repeatedly uses federal laws to extradite Negroes to legal lynchings in the South.

The Jackson, Miss., Daily News, spokesman for those forces who demand the death of Willie McGee as they urged the lynching of the Martinsville Seven, unwittingly reveals why we have reached that stage of jim crow terror in which seven Negroes can be summarily executed in the face of world protest. It stated: "The big business of the nation today is preparing for war." Referring to McGee's defenders, the News then asked rhetorically: why ship troops to Korea when we can do our killing right here?

The reaction of the Dixiecrat South to efforts by progressive Americans to end the centuries-long persecution of Negro Americans is extremely alarming. Threats of force and violence against those who would dare to enter Mississippi, there to question its "due process" in the case of Willie McGee, are openly made by the press.

This, of course, is understandable. Dixie lynch law has mapped out and pursued its murderous course without serious challenge for more than three-quarters of a century. But this continued violation of the Constitutional liberties, civil and human rights of Negro Americans today menaces the foundations of free government and impinges upon the very peace of the world.

That fact gives the case of Willie McGee its national and international significance.

--William L. Patterson
Executive Secretary, CRC

THE STAKE OF LABOR

Laurel, Miss. where the alleged rape occurred, is an industrial town. Situated there is one of the plants of the giant Masonite Corporation employing some three thousand workers. For many years the workers in this plant have been organized in a union presently affiliated with the International Woodworkers of America. Despite their observance of local custom by breaking up the workers into a white and a Negro local union, these white and Negro workers have, in the past, achieved a large measure of unity and cooperation. That is why three or four years ago the workers in this plant had not only a strong, solid union but also, it is said, the best wages and working conditions in the South.

Then the ownership of the Masonite Corporation began to see and use the possibilities afforded it by the lynch hysteria which was created around the Willie McGee case. Obviously, it is not possible to have anti-Negro lynch spirit in a community, resulting in two attempted lynchings, and at the same time continue the kind of cooperation in the factory between white and Negro workers that is needed to keep the union unified and strong.

So, as was to be expected, the wages and other conditions of workers in the Masonite plant did not continue to improve as they had in the past. No longer were the working conditions in Laurel better than the rest of the South. The union began to have to fight for its very existence. Just before the CRC delegation went to Jackson last year, the union ended a fruitless six-month long strike which achieved none of its objectives because the employer used community lynch spirit to try to smash the union. In January of this year the union had to go out on strike again -- this time in an effort to bridge the tremendous gap between wages paid in Laurel and in another of the company's plants in California.

The cooperation of Negro and white workers is a source of great strength to unions everywhere. Looked at conversely, the development of antagonism between workers based on their race or color weakens unions, leads to their destruction, and (as illustrated in the drive to organize the South) prevents their organization in the first place. Thus unions, in their own interest, must fight against legal lynchings in general and on behalf of Willie McGee in particular.

THE ACTION....

1. Demand of President Truman that he order his Attorney General to use the Federal Civil Rights Act to save Willie McGee's life and secure his freedom. Order him also to intervene in all court proceedings on his behalf.

2. Demand that Governor Fielding Wright, Jackson, Miss. stay the execution and issue a complete pardon to McGee.

3. Set up everywhere, in all kinds of groups, Committees to Save Willie McGee. There should be trade union committees, church committees, student committees, etc.

4. Call upon all public officials (with special attention to seeing or telephoning Congressmen and Senators) to demand that they communicate with Truman and Wright and publicize what they have done.

5. Get resolutions adopted, circulate petitions, and get tens of thousands of people to telephone, wire, or write Truman and Wright.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

As a member of the Executive Council of Highlander Folk School you will be interested in the Workshop on Religion and Labor that will be held there, September 25-30. We deeply appreciate the cooperative spirit of the School that welcomes this kind of project.

The attached sheet tells more about the Workshop. We believe it will help immensely to have a small group together for a week to get acquainted, exchange views, dig more deeply into the philosophy that motivates a movement like ours. It was prompted largely by the growing interest in forming local Religion and Labor Fellowships.

We wish very much that you might be with us for all, or at least a part of the time.

Sincerely yours,

RELIGION & LABOR

THE MUTUAL AIMS OF RELIGION AND LABOR

DEMOCRACY firmly rooted in the industrial structure, resting in strong and independent labor unions and infused by religion with spiritual and ethical vitality, will not only be able to withstand the attacks of those who would turn back the course of human progress, but will express itself through an increasingly enlightened structure of law in behalf of the entire nation and of the world. Once the lifting of the level of the life of humanity becomes the measure by which is judged the quality of leadership provided both by religious organizations and by organized labor, mankind may push forward toward the goal of the good life. A world order based on freedom and justice instead of on force and disorder may then emerge through all the difficult processes of social advance. Placing their faith in the people, believing that power should be shared and not monopolized and that democratic education must supplant tyrannical exploitation, labor and religion together may help lead the way.

THE OBJECTIVES
of the National Religion and Labor Foundation

TO DISCOVER the implications of our Judeo-Christian faith and apply them to our social, economic and political life.

TO HELP the religious and labor movements in interpreting their aims and programs to one another; and to bring them into relations of mutual understanding and cooperation.

TO AID the movements of religion and labor in discovering and applying such techniques of social action as may advance the social ideals of the church and synagogue and the program of organized labor.

TO ENCOURAGE and SUPPORT the organization of the occupationally unorganized who still suffer from substandard conditions of living, and to defend the trade union movement when unjustly attacked.

TO DEFEND our traditional American civil rights and extend them to all our people without respect to color, religion, race or national origin.

TO WORK for constructive social legislation, especially as it applies to the rights and responsibilities of workers.

TO COOPERATE WITH all related democratic movements having the common purpose of defeating repressive and anti-democratic forces and of building an economy of abundance, security and peace.

TO WORK FOR such basic changes in the economic system as will both eliminate the evils of concentrated wealth and restore to the people the riches of the earth which God in His Providence created for them.

THE ANNUAL CONFERENCE IN 1950

will be held March 20-22 at the Hotel Gibson, Cincinnati

THE PROGRAM

TO FOSTER the growth of Metropolitan Religion and Labor Fellowships and Councils, through which the aims of the organization can be implemented in local communities; and to serve these through literature, counsel, speakers and staff visitation;

TO PROMOTE and supervise the activities of an Interseminary Division established to organize branches in theological schools;

TO SET UP local, regional, national and international conferences, through which religious and labor leaders may be brought together to evaluate and advance the policies of the organization;

TO SET UP emergency meetings at the time of strikes to give each side in the conflict an opportunity to express its case, and to take appropriate action;

TO CONDUCT traveling economic seminars for churchmen, educators, trade unionists and other social leaders who desire first-hand knowledge about conditions in industry and agriculture;

TO HAVE representation at hearings, state and national, at which legislation affecting the public welfare is being considered;

TO PUBLISH a monthly bulletin, ECONOMIC JUSTICE, to interpret the aims and program of the religion-labor movement, and to report upon activities among individuals and groups in the field;

TO SUPPLY individuals and groups with helpful information in the field of Religion and Labor.

Testimonials

"Bread and brotherhood are twin needs of mankind. It is fitting that labor and religion should join forces in the quest for a better way of life. Without the guiding light of God's word, man labors in vain. We know too, that the word of God is likely to fall on deaf ears, when the listeners are hungry. Religion and Labor, working together, each cognizant of the dual need of men, can indeed guide the world far toward peace and unity." LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

"A very close relationship should be established between the representatives of religion and labor. The development of our spiritual life depends very much upon the establishment of decent labor and economic standards. I express the hope that the National Foundation of Religion and Labor will meet with a full measure of success in all its work." WILLIAM GREEN

"The religious tradition of America underlies all democratic ideals and aims. When rightly construed and applied it sets up standards of living, of opportunity and of constructive effort that guarantee each person a full and abundant life. The labor movement strives for a progressive application of our religious principles to industrial society. When, therefore, religion and labor are true to their calling, they stand for the same thing. This is why they wish to work together."
DWIGHT J. BRADLEY

"The atomic era has begun. We now must either create world peace or prepare for an era of annihilation. We will build one world or die. We cannot have world peace without industrial peace and that in turn depends upon economic justice. The Religion and Labor Foundation unites the forces of religion with the forces of labor in a common struggle for righteousness." JEROME DAVIS

"Labor and religion seek through education and organization to make this world of ours a fit place for men, women and children to live in. Priests, ministers and rabbis are united in their belief in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Union leaders seek the creation of a world in which men live their lives according to the highest religious insights. The Church and the union both seek to implement the will of God in the lives of men."
PHILLIP MURRAY

"If we are to build a better world tomorrow, religion must become the spokesman for all classes and labor must have the breadth of view and the feeling of dedication which comes of religious conviction. Judaism has always insisted on the rights of the worker and respected the dignity of his contribution."
STEPHEN S. WISE

"We have much to gain by closer unity between organized religion and organized labor. The basis of such unity is not artificial. We find it in a common ethical goal. That goal is described as simple justice among men, and the assertion of the worth and dignity of the individual. Any religion that looks to this goal and teaches this credo is a natural friend and ally of organized labor."

Dear Friend:

We have nothing but good news this time. It comes from two fronts of conquest. First, our recent annual convention in Cincinnati. We could exhaust all the superlatives in the arena of adjectives to describe these victories and still be telling the truth - fine, splendid, excellent, encouraging, enthusiastic, inspiring, stimulating, successful, wonderful and a few more.

In attendance, it more than doubled the number of last year, and was perhaps the largest in our history of 21 years. In quality of addresses, they were so filled with the winds of the Spirit that they truly swept the audiences into the sphere of the ethereal. And in practical accomplishment, the three commissions really dug down to bedrock on the most important spiritual and social issues facing the Foundation. Dr. Leonard A. Stidley, Dean of the Graduate School of Theology, Oberlin College, writes us, "Our students came back bubbling over, and said that they had had an enthusiastic religious experience."

The good news on our second front relates to our MEMBERSHIP DRIVE about which you have been reading in recent issues of ECONOMIC JUSTICE. This DRIVE, to date, has added NEW, and reactivated OLD MEMBERSHIPS to the total tune of 107, and netted $1,165.00 to the treasury.

All of this good news furnishes concrete evidence of the remarkable progress made by the Foundation since its reorganization two years ago. At that time we were financially bankrupt, with a deficit of $4,500.00, all of which has been cleared up, with current expenses met on time. We had also acquired popular suspicions which psralysed the work of the organization for several months and threatened its death. These suspicions have been completely overcome. From an organization struggling for survival, it has become a successful one treading the path of triumph.

We trust that you discern between the lines, and beneath the letter of these words, the irresistible power of faith that removes mountains of difficulties, discouragements and apathies. That original faith has been strengthened by our steady progress, and we invite your continued company in our march toward goals of greater service in the future.

Sincerely yours,
Witherspoon Dodge

Dear Dr. Johnson:

The State of Georgia recently has made democratic history by killing the poll tax. For the first time, the people of Georgia will have free suffrage.

This important move toward democracy at home has been made possible by the courage and initiative of Governor Ellis Arnall, a young and rising statesman of the Deep South who already has given proof of an admirable progressivism in word and act. It is our opinion that the merit of such a man should be recognized and signalled by the lovers of democracy everywhere, and his service to the cause of popular government supported, and we propose the commendatory statement which accompanies this letter to you.

We cordially invite you to join your name with ours in addressing to Governor Arnall this expression of esteem and gratitude.

Sincerely yours,

Frank P. Graham

A TRIBUTE TO GOVERNOR ARNALL OF GEORGIA

A resounding, though unheralded, break in the solid front of the eight poll-tax states of the South has occurred. The Georgia legislature, at the forceful initiative of a young, progressive governor, has abolished the tax on voting (poll tax).

Obviously it is desirable that, wherever possible, anti-poll-tax measures be initiated and carried through by natives of the states primarily concerned: democratic reform is most admirable when it springs from the moral convictions and is achieved by the elective powers of the community in which reform is needed. The great argument of the reactionary politicians, whose careers are based on a restricted suffrage in their home states, was and is that anti-poll-tax sentiment is exclusively a "foreign" doctrine. Georgia's action effectively disproves the demagogic claim that the people of the poll--tax states themselves are, by some quaint persuasion, favorable to the device that decimates the electorate.

There is a vast stirring in the masses of the common people of the South which has expressed itself of late in the election of progressive candidates to public office. Hill of Alabama, Pepper of Florida, Fulbright of Arkansas, are cases in point. The Deep South is in process of taking its rightful place abreast of the historic epoch in which it lives. The war has accelerated this tendency by making clear the indispensibility of the common man - in the armed forces, in the factory, on the farm. It is difficult to publicly oppose enfranchisement of those who defend the country. It is almost equally difficult to stand against votes for their brothers who are producing the munitions with which they fight and the food which sustains the nation in its time of peril.

We salute Governor Ellis Arnall of Georgia for his leadership in this historic upheaval. He stands directly in the tradition of Thomas Jefferson of Virginia and Andrew Jackson of Tennessee, great popular leaders in their epochs. It is time that out of the South should again come a voice which speaks for the common man who by the work of his hand and brain has made America. The emergence of Governor Arnall to the front rank of progressive political leaders in this country is a warning to those regressive forces which have long monopolized political and economic power in the South. In his career, the Governor of Georgia symbolizes the arrival of the people to power and gives earnest of an unshackled and progressive South.

Dear Friend:

I am writing to ask your assistance in a critical situation. We are facing an economic crisis in the South which threatens to deprive millions of people of their precarious basis of existence and to create greater misery than during the era of "Okies" and homeless migrants in the 1930's. According to conservative estimates a half million farm families in the cotton states will be displaced in the next two years as the result of accelerated technological developments. Cotton fields that have required the intensive, tedious and backbreaking work of millions of men, women and children will be turned into streamlined outdoor factories, traversed by mammoth cotton-picking machines and flame-throwing cotton choppers. What will this mean to the uprooted millions?

In 1939 there was a national scandal when a thousand sharecropper families were evicted in southeast Missouri and camped on the roadsides because they had no place else to go. Many times that number will be on the roads in the months to come, former sharecroppers, wage-hands and the poorest marginal farmers. They will include thousands of former service men, home from the war, to become casualties of our peacetime economy. They will be families with no reserves and no skills beyond their experience with the land, deprived of the only modicum of security they had ever known, uprooted from the soil close to which they had lived and worked.

There is an answer for these outcasts other than the grudging relief rolls of the cities. There is an organization which is attempting to deal with this problem, not just in terms of sociological facts and statistical tables, but in terms of the destiny of men and women, fathers and mothers who are striving to provide a home for their children, to save them from the haunting fear of eviction and hunger.

The enclosed leaflet tells the story of the heroic 12-year struggle of the sharecroppers' union, a union which was born in the terrible depression years and which now puts forward a concrete program to avoid disaster in the postwar period. The average sharecropper member earns less than $400 in a good year. To support his organization he has to deprive his family of the necessities of life. So that we may underwrite the educational and the essential relief work of the Union, the National Sharecroppers Fund asks for $25,000 from members of the public who are aware of the gravity of this crisis. May we count on you to help? Will you send your contribution today?

Sincerely yours,

Frank P. Graham

The New Cotton-Picker

Department of Agriculture estimates that in the Mississippi Delta eight out of ten persons now engaged in cotton cultivation will not be needed when full-scale mechanization is installed. 500,000 families will be displaced in the next two years. Will this revolution mean emancipation to the drudges of the rural South, or will it create chaos, driving millions destitute and homeless, onto the highways to seek odd jobs or relief in overcrowded cities? Shall we revert to the scenes of the 1930s?

They have that each has a chance to earn a living for his family. They remember 1936, when $1 a day w cotton, and the average sharecropper family earned $150 cash a year. Now, facing the great p chines will replace "hands" in Southern agriculture, the National Farm Labor Union, formerl Farmers Union, has drawn up a constructive program to try to provide for those displaced and cency the standards of those retained in the area of cotton production. A part of this program is

Highlights in the History of Twelve Years of Struggle The Southern Tenant Farmers Union

1934 Twenty-seven Negro and white sharecroppers, meeting in Tyronza, Arkansas to protest the planters' cheating them of their share of federal A.A.A. payments, found the Southern Tenant Farmers Union.

1934 Union meeting in church in Birdsong, Arkansas stormed by mob of planters and deputy sheriffs.

1935 Reign of terror launched in Marked Tree, Arkansas as union organization of Negroes and whites proceeds. Meetings fired on by vigilantes, churches burned, homes of leaders raided, organizers kidnapped, imprisoned, beaten.

1937 J. R. Butler, president of the Union, beaten by planters' agents in the Forrest City, Ark., Court House.

1938 20,000 Negro and white laborers in Oklahoma, Arkansas and Missouri receive pay increases of 25 to 50 cents (bringing day's wages above $1) as a result of Cotton Pickers' Strike of Union members.

1939 Seventeen hundred sharecropper families in Southeast Missouri, evicted from their homes by planters who changed over to day labor, camp on the roadsides. Union organizes protest. Government builds Delmo Farm Labor Homes to house them.

1942 Union organizes groups of farm workers to travel where needed to alleviate desperate farm labor shortage threatening food supply of country at war.

1944 Delmo families threatened with eviction. Union mobilizes protest action, ending in tenants' purchase of their homes from government with backing of National Sharecroppers Fund and setting up of genuine housing cooperative of farm workers.

1945 Convention meeting at St. Louis changes name to National Farm Labor Union, elects H. L. Mitchell president and draws up postwar reconversion program.

WILL YOU HELP TO AVERT CATASTROPHE?

Chaos in the South will drag the whole country down in this precarious period of postwar readjustment. Thousands of uprooted farm people, unskilled in city ways, pouring into urban communities in search of public relief as a last resort, are a frightening and dismal prospect.

Our best hope of prevention lies in the intelligent association and action of the people themselves. We cannot do the job of organization for them, but we can back them up.

WHAT YOU CAN DO

A member of the National Farm Labor Union in the South averages earnings of less than $400 a year. He must take food from the mouths of his children to support his organization.

Therefore, the National Sharecroppers Fund has pledged to raise $25,000 to underwrite the educational and welfare work of the National Farm Labor Union for 1946.

We call on you to help these courageous people. Send your contribution to the $25,000 fund today.

Subject: A Proposed Project in the Field of Southern Agriculture

The Southern Regional Council is deeply interested in the problems of Southern agriculture. From time to time we have published articles on this subject, and we are tentatively considering sponsoring a special conference on the mechanization of agriculture sometime in the spring of 1947.

We would like very much to do something which is more directly related to the basic problem of sharecropping and tenancy in the South. Here are two suggested projects. We can undertake either or both of them provided we can obtain sufficient financial support to enable us to secure some special assistance for carrying them out.

(a) Preparation of a Simple "Political Primer" for Persons on the Educational Level of Croppers and Tenants. This pamphlet would cover such topics as: basic facts about Southern farming, the effects of mechanization, information on governmental and other agencies serving farmers, some political facts of life, and suggestions for social and political action. It would be written in simple language, illustrated with simple drawings, and attractively printed.

The cost of preparing the first 25,000 copies of this pamphlet would be approximately $500. With a subsidy of not less than $1,000 we could print and distribute without charge about 50,000 copies.

(b) Preparation of a Popular Pamphlet About Sharecropping and Tenancy. This publication would be aimed not at the sharecropper himself, but at the general reader. It would try to give the reader a better understanding of the problems of Southern agriculture and the things which can and should be done in order to get rid of the evils which afflict it. It would emphasize reform measures and the steps which progressive citizens ought to take in order to put them into effect.

This pamphlet would be larger and more expensive to produce than the one proposed above. However, a subsidy of $1,000 would enable us to produce such a publication, allowing about $300 for research, writing, and illustration, and about $700 for printing.

The Southern Regional Council is anxious to promote these projects, but this is virtually impossible on our present budget. We earnestly hope, therefore, that the National Sharecroppers Fund will be willing to extend assistance which will enable us to go ahead with one, if not both, of these proposals.

Needless to say, in whatever we might undertake along this line, we shall cooperate with the Georgia Workers Education Service and other agencies whose interests overlap to some extent with ours.

A REPORT ON THE WORK OF THE SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

This is a brief report on the activities and plans of the Southern Regional Council. Under separate cover I am sending some publications of the Council. Some of these will be referred to in the succeeding paragraphs.

At our Charter Meeting in February, 1944, the Council absorbed the Commission on Interracial Cooperation and set out to promote a broader and more vigorous program in behalf of human progress in the South. On account of the war, suitable personnel was exceedingly hard to find. Our small staff faced numerous demands on its services and was greatly overworked throughout the year. We inherited certain activities and good will from the Commission on Interracial Cooperation and we felt obliged to carry on as far as possible the worthwhile activities which we inherited. However, in spite of our various difficulties, we made considerable progress during 1944. For details of our activities during that year, let me refer you to Report of the Executive Directors 1944.

In the summer of 1945 our personnel situation began to improve considerably. A grant from the Julius Rosenwald Fund enabled us to employ Dr. George S. Mitchell to direct a special project in behalf of Negro veterans. We were also able to secure a very capable public relations man, Mr. Ray Warwick, who had had considerable experience in editorial and publicity work. Furthermore, we added two research assistants, one white and one colored, two field representatives on a part-time basis, and an office manager. On January 1, 1946, Dr. H. L. Trigg, who was formerly President of Elizabeth City Teachers' College in North Carolina, joined our staff as full-time Associate Director. He succeeded Dr. Ira De A. Reid, who had given splendid service on a part-time basis since the formation of the Council.

During 1945 our activities expanded considerably in spite of the small staff which we had during the first half of the year. Briefly, the major Council projects were as follows:

(1) Revitalizing the State Interracial Groups in the South. Ten of our thirteen states have interracial councils or committees. We felt that they had a function to perform, particularly as we approached the postwar period, and we have given them as much assistance as possible in conferences, advice and literature. Most of these groups have adopted formal affiliation agreements with SRC and some of them are in process of merging with SRC to become state divisions. This process will help tremendously in bringing our program down to state and local levels.

(2) Cooperation with Numerous Agencies Working in the South. A detailed list of these agencies would be quite extensive. It includes, in addition to state and local interracial committees, such organizations as the Women's Division of the Methodist Church, the Urban League, the YMCA, the YWCA, the Boy Scouts of America, the USO, the Southern Conference for Human Welfare, the American Association of University Women, etc. Let me add that when the Governor of Kentucky established a Commission for the Study of Negro Affairs, we were asked by the Chairman to advise the Commission in setting up its work. The Commission made its report several months ago, and its recommendations represent a new departure from Commissions of this sort in the South. Here let me refer you to the tear sheet from the Louisville Courier-Journal, summarizing the report of the Governor's Commission. The Chairman of the Governor's Commission is Chairman of our affiliate, the Kentucky Council on Interracial Cooperation, and he is vigorously pushing the legislative program recommended by the Governor's Commission.

(3) Conference on the South's Postwar Economy. The Council sponsored this conference in Atlanta on April 11-12, 1945. A group of experts presented various phases of the South's postwar problems and prospects. We feel that the conference helped to focus the attention of the South upon its postwar outlook. In this connection, please see our publication, The South - America's Opportunity Number One.

(4) Survey of Reconversion Problems. This brief survey was based on a sampling of families in twenty Southern communities, including large cities, small cities, and rural areas. It covered such topics as migration, employment, acquisition of new skills, changes in the family situation, and plans of the interviewees for the reconversion period. The processing of the statistical data has been slow due to inadequate funds, but the results of the study will shortly be ready for release.

(5) Survey of Segregated Transportation in Atlanta. During the summer and fall of 1945 the Council made a spot study of transportation in Atlanta under the direction of Dr. Ira De A. Reid. The study included an examination of the laws and ordinances relating to separation in transportation and thorough observations on facilities, services and practices with respect to railways, railway terminals, interurban busses, street cars, city busses, taxicabs, and the municipal airport. Some very significant material was developed. The report has recently been completed and we are now at the point of attempting to get remedial action on the basis of the findings.

(6) Promotion of the Use of Negro Police in Southern Cities. We have continued this project which was begun by the Commission on Interracial Cooperation. We have had numerous occasions to advise officials and private citizens who are interested in extending the use of Negro police. We are making special efforts to promote the idea in Atlanta. In recent months Norfolk, Tampa, Asheville, and Richmond have instituted the use of Negro police. In every instance the informational material which we had circulated was a helpful factor.

(7) Veterans Service Project. In the summer of 1945 we obtained a special grant from the Rosenwald Fund which enabled us to employ Dr. George S. Mitchell to undertake a special project in behalf of Negro veterans. The purpose of this project is to examine the operation of veterans' services in the Southern States, to point out weaknesses and discriminations with respect to the services rendered to Negro veterans, to make constructive suggestions to the various veterans' agencies and to inform Negroes concerning their rights and privileges as veterans. With the assistance of a field staff of eight to ten persons, mostly Negro veterans, this project has gone forward in a very satisfactory way. Dr. Mitchell has kept in close touch with the National Veterans Administration as well as administration at the state and local level.

(8) Informational services. Requests for information have reached such proportions that we really need a full-time person to handle them. Although the majority of the requests relate to factual information about the Negro or race relations, many of them deal with other matters. Apparently we are gradually becoming a clearing house for all sorts of informational material concerning the South.

(9) Publications. In response to popular demand, we have continued such Commission pamphlets as America's Tenth Man and Understanding Our Neighbors. We have also printed or reprinted timely articles and leaflets for taking care of the numerous requests which we get for free material, particularly on the subject of race relations. The Southern Frontier has been replaced by New South, which is being published monthly. Once each quarter New South is enlarged to give a larger coverage on some special problem. The first of these special issues was the March, 1946, issue entitled Wanted: The South's Future for the Nation, which was written by Dr. Rupert B. Vance as a condensation of his new book entitled All These People. Governor Ellis Arnall contributed a foreword. This publication has attracted wide attention. It was also syndicated through the Associated Press in the form of four special articles and these were featured by forty or more Southern newspapers. The next special issue of New South will be devoted to the problem of health. At the annual meeting of the Council in November, 1945, the Council adopted the policy of placing more emphasis upon literature suitable for mass distribution and broadening the coverage beyond the problem of race relations.

For a brief report on the actions taken at the 1945 annual meeting of SRC, please see the December, 1945, issue of The Southern Frontier. During the present year we are continuing the above activities, with the exception of (3), (4), and (5). In addition, our program includes the following projects:

(1) Survey of the Negro Community in Jacksonville, Florida. Several months ago a bi-racial committee in Jacksonville invited us to plan and supervise a survey there. During the past four months we have given considerable time to this work because we feel it has great possibilities for setting a pattern of self-examination by other communities. The Survey was completed early in May, 1946, and was published on May 30 by the Council of Social Agencies at Jacksonville under the title Jacksonville Looks at Its Negro Community. The Council of Social Agencies at Jacksonville supervised the survey and most of the work was done by local citizens, white and colored. The Community Fund appropriated $2,000 to finance the work. The Survey had the backing of prominent citizens of both races, including some of the city and county officials. The recommendations are specific and reasonable and we have every reason to believe that the city and county will make an honest effort to act on them. If this project results in progressive action, as we believe it will, we expect to be asked to assist with similar surveys in other communities. This means that we shall need more staff and more funds than we have at present.

(2) Expansion of SRC Membership. We are committed to the development of a mass membership in the Council. About six months ago we launched a promotional campaign, which has already raised the Council membership from 1,000 to 1,400 members. We hope that by the end of the year we will have at least 3,000 members. This will not only give us more effectiveness in promoting our program, but will mean that members and contributors assume an increasing share in the financial support of the Council.

(3) Establishment of State Divisions of SRC. Three state interracial councils, namely, Florida, Mississippi, and South Carolina, have already merged with us to become state divisions of SRC. We have cooperating or affiliated arrangements with the state interracial groups in Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Kentucky, and Texas, and it is probable that some of these groups will become state divisions of SRC in the near future. In Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee, where there are no active state groups, we are planning to organize our members into state divisions sometime during the present year. It goes without saying that such an arrangement enables us to promote our work more effectively on the state and local levels.

(4) Police Administration. The Council is committed to the policy of trying to do something to improve the quality of police administration and police behavior in the South. Specifically, we wish (a) to make a brief survey of police systems in selected Southern cities and particular reference to the quality of police personnel and its relation to the treatment of Negroes, and (b) to prepare a police training manual for use in the South along the lines of the manual which was recently developed by the California Department of Justice, with the assistance of the American Council on Race Relations. Now that the Jacksonville Survey has been completed, we are ready to launch this police project.

(5) Work with Public Officials. This is closely related to number (4). Here, however, we had in mind the establishment of closer working contacts with the Conference of Southern Governors, the various Associations of Peace Officers, and with individual public officials such as mayors and police chiefs. The general idea is to try to bring these people to a better understanding of the causes of racial tension and to help them work out techniques for preventing tensions and for handling outbreaks in the wisest possible way.

(6) Investigation of Racial Disturbance at Columbia, Tennessee. As you know, an unfortunate incident occurred at Columbia, Tennessee, late in February, 1946. Three SRC staff members investigated this occurence. We submitted a confidential report to the U. S. Department of Justice and requested that a Federal Grand Jury be asked to investigate the violation of civil rights at Columbia. We published a report on Columbia in the May issue of New South, a copy of which is in the package which is being sent.

(7) Conference of SRC Fellows. We have 38 Honorary Fellows scattered throughout the South who give various voluntary services to the Council. They have been quite helpful in a number of ways, and we believe that they could be much more helpful if they could be brought together for a conference or clinic. Our Executive Committee instructed us to hold such a conference of Fellows this year, provided special funds could be obtained to finance it. This matter was laid before one of the foundations in May, 1946, with the result that we have received a grant which will enable us to proceed with a conference of Fellows. We plan to hold a two-day conference in November, just after the annual meeting of the Council.

We have now reached the point where we see more clearly than ever the great opportunity for the Council in education, coordination, and stimulation of progressive action in the South. We believe that we can take pride in the beginning that we have made in the past two years, but we are by no means satisfied with what we have done. We have reached the crucial point where we either stand still more or less or expand our activities in such a way as to exploit the opportunity which faces us. Our greatest need now is for additional funds which will enable us to employ the personnel which we need so badly and to go forward more rapidly with the special projects which we have under way.

The Southern Regional Council is deeply interested in the problems of Southern agriculture. From time to time we have published articles on this subject, and we are tentatively considering sponsoring a special conference on the mechanization of agriculture sometime in the spring of 1947.

We would like very much to do something which is more directly related to the basic problem of sharecropping and tenancy in the South. Here are two suggested projects. We can undertake either or both of them provided we can obtain sufficient financial support to enable us to secure some special assistance for carrying them out.

(a) Preparation of a Simple "Political Primer" for Persons on the Educational Level of Croppers and Tenants. This pamphlet would cover such topics as: basic facts about Southern farming, the effects of mechanization, information on governmental and other agencies serving farmers, some political facts of life, and suggestions for social and political action. It would be written in simple language, illustrated with simple drawings, and attractively printed.

The cost of preparing the first 25,000 copies of this pamphlet would be approximately $500. With a subsidy of not less than $1,000 we could print and distribute without charge about 50,000 copies.

(b) Preparation of a Popular Pamphlet About Sharecropping and Tenancy. This publication would be aimed not at the sharecropper himself, but at the general reader. It would try to give the reader a better understanding of the problems of Southern agriculture and the things which can and should be done in order to get rid of the evils which afflict it. It would emphasize reform measures and the steps which progressive citizens ought to take in order to put them into effect.

This pamphlet would be larger and more expensive to produce than the one proposed above. However, a subsidy of $1,000 would enable us to produce such a publication, allowing about $300 for research, writing, and illustration, and about $700 for printing.

The Southern Regional Council is anxious to promote these projects, but this is virtually impossible on our present budget. We earnestly hope, therefore, that the National Sharecroppers Fund will be willing to extend assistance which will enable us to go ahead with one, if not both, of these proposals.

Needless to say, in whatever we might undertake along this line, we shall cooperate with the Georgia Workers Education Service and other agencies whose interests overlap to some extent with ours.

Dear Miss Caples:

Dr. Ira De A. Reid has recently handed me a copy of your letter to him dated May 24, 1946. He suggested that I might want to send you some information on the activities and plans of the Southern Regional Council.

I am enclosing two memoranda. The first of these is a report on the work of the Southern Regional Council and the other is a request for financial assistance from the National Sharecroppers Fund for a special project. If you would like to have further information about the Council's program or the proposed project, please let me know.

Cordially yours,

Dear Ira:

Thank you for your letter of June 27 and the enclosure of a copy of Miss Caples' letter to you on May 24. It looks as if the National Sharecroppers Fund might be willing to help us out a little.

I was about to send you some dope to use in a memorandum to the National Sharecroppers Fund in behalf of the Council, when I found that you were to be away this week, so I have taken the liberty of sending the material on directly to Miss Caples. A copy is enclosed.

All good wishes.

Dear Guy:

Here is a copy of the letter that Anna Caples, the office secretary of the National Sharecroppers Fund, sent me. Will you draft in behalf of the Southern Regional Council and such other agencies that you may have in mind the sort of statement that I might send Miss Caples, in an effort to secure some sort of support in our behalf from that source? I shall be very glad to forward it under my name, if you so wish.

Dear Professor Reid:

It was extremely generous of you to reckon such a large share of your expense on the trip to New York to personal business. We appreciate your kindness deeply. Mr. Lewis is transmitting a check to you.

I believe I told you that the National Sharecroppers Fund is anxious to learn of organizations who are doing the kind of work in the South which we and you believe to be basic. This year, in addition to the Southern Tenant Farmers Union (National Farm Labor Union), we are assisting the National Farmers Union in Alabama, the Delmo Homes Cooperative and are making a token contribution to the Georgia Workers Education Service particularly for rural work. During the past twelve months we have been able to increase the funds raised through our efforts and before the end of this year we shall probably be in a position to give assistance to at least one other group. There is no one who has such extensive knowledge of southern organizations working along these lines as you have. We shall appreciate any suggestions that you are able to give to the Board of organizations that need help and fit into the general pattern of our interests.

Sincerely yours,

/s/ Anna Caples

Dear Frank:

I have received a letter from Mrs. Agnes Douty concerning a project which has been proposed by the National Sharecroppers Fund. I am very much interested in the project, and I wish that I could attend the meeting which Mrs. Douty mentions in her letter, but I am leaving shortly for a vacation and will not get back until about September 1.

I suggest that Ray Warwick or George Mitchell, or both of them, be invited to take part in the discussions of the project.

Dear Mr. Johnson:

Mr. Alfred Baker Lewis of the National Sharecroppers Fund has written me that the Union for Democratic Action has proposed to the Fund that it finance a project which would be a study of 1946 elections in the Southern States.

Before embarking on such a project, Mr. Lewis would like very much to get the advice of a number of Southerners as to the wisdom, usefulness, and practicability of undertaking such a study, to begin sometime in early Fall.

He has asked me to act as temporary convenor of a meeting at which such persons as yourself might get together for a consideration of the proposed project. Mr. Lewis would come to Atlanta for such a meeting.

I've talked this matter over with Mr. Frank McCallister and Kenneth Douty. We've added some names to the original list suggested by Mr. Lewis and are asking some 15 persons to advise with Mr. Lewis on the proposed project.

Would you be interested in participating in such a meeting, and if so, would you be free to do so some evening between August 11 and August 26?

Since I shall be at Chapel Hill for the next ten days, I would appreciate it if you would write or call Frank McCallister and let him know about your availability and interest.

For your information, I am indicating below the proposed scope of the study as indicated to me in Mr. Lewis' communication.

"The study would include: (1) the effect of election law changes on the primaries and the elections, in terms of Negroes, whites, veterans, the 18-21 age groups, etc.; (2) the attitudes of political parties and of the groupings within the political parties; (3) an analysis of non-party organizations, Negro, white and inter-racial, and the influence on the election."

The meeting would be held in Atlanta, probably at my home, 19 Baltimore Block.

Mr. McCallister can be reached as indicated below.

I hope you will want to advise with the rest of us on this matter.

Sincerely yours,

Agnes Martocci Douty

THE CONDITION OF FARM WORKERS IN 1949

REPORT TO THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND, INC.
By Beth Biderman, Executive Secretary

FOOD AND CLOTHING

Depression of the standard of living of farm workers continues. With the growth of unemployment, cases of malnutrition and starvation are becoming more frequent (see below). The price of food and clothing in the stores where most farm laborers are compelled to make their purchases has not declined appreciably, and they can not afford even "sub-standard" subsistence.

HOUSING

The housing bill passed by Congress included a provision allocating 10 per cent of all new housing for the use of farm workers living in rural communities off the farm. This section of the act, however, has not yet been interpreted. In the meantime farm workers are compelled to live in tents or the flimsy shacks sometimes provided by the large farmers.

The sale of the government-owned migrant camps has again been postponed until June 30, 1950, but the large farm-owner groups are exerting pressure to force the government to relinquish them. The government now leases these camps to private agencies and individuals who are responsible for their care and upkeep. The result is almost complete neglect of repairs, higher rents and fewer services.

WAGES

The new farm bill passed by Congress revised the parity price index to include the costs of labor hired by employers. The inevitable result of this legislation was reported in a Department of Agriculture bulletin for January 1950, in which the statistics show a 1 per cent increase in the cost of farm products and a simultaneous decrease of 1.4 per cent in farm wages. At the same time, Congress again refused to include farm workers under the Fair Labor Standards and Social Security Acts even though such amendments were presented in committee hearings with the strong support of labor, welfare and religious groups.

An abortive attempt was made during 1949 to extend this dual policy (protection for farm owners; none for farm workers) to the interpretation of the Taft-Hartley Act. Farm workers are specifically excluded from any protection under the Taft-Hartley Act, thus denying them even the limited safeguards given industrial workers in their organizing and collective bargaining efforts. Yet the DiGiorgio Corporation, one of the largest farm-owners in the world, attempted to invoke the penalties of this law against the National Farm Labor Union. DiGiorgio was upheld by Robert Denham, General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board. When the NLRB reversed Denham's decision, however, it marked a significant victory for farm laborers.

EDUCATION

The national shortage of teachers and schools is multiplied and magnified in rural areas. Even where educational facilities are available, children of farm workers, especially migrants, are denied these facilities. In many cases, investigation shows, children of school age work in the fields to supplement the family income. Until wages are improved, depriving the family of the tiny sum child labor earns may mean the difference between survival and starvation.

When parents do try to send their children to school, another factor limits their attendance. The children do not have the proper clothing and are ashamed of the contrast they present to their more fortunate classmates. Children of migrants who have the tenacity to remain in rural schools frequently are the butt of their classmates' ridicule because of their appearance. And, even if all of these obstacles are overcome, a third hurdle sometimes proves greatest of all--lack of adequate transportation to rural public schools.

HEALTH

Aside from the effects of economic factors on the health of agricultural workers a great shortage of rural health facilities exists. With the cessation of government operation of migrant camps, doctors and nurses were no longer maintained. Private welfare agencies and hospitals in rural towns are overburdened and over-crowded; many of the welfare agencies have expressed the opinion that they are no longer able to cope with this problem which has reached such vast proportions and that the government must now take action.

CALIFORNIA AND THE SOUTHWEST

Since this section of the country has many problems peculiarly its own, it seems best to deal with it separately. The Southwest now produces 50 per cent of the nation's cotton (as compared with 2.2 per cent in 1932) and an almost equal proportion of the food crops. Of the more than 3,000,000 farm workers in the nation, 500,000 live in California alone.

Cotton Pickers' Strike: More than 100,000 cotton pickers stopped work in September, protesting a cut in wages from $3 per hundred pounds to $2.50. The National Farm Labor Union, which was already established in the San Joaquin Valley, gave leadership and direction to this strike. The workers were familiar with the Union's long and courageous strike against the DiGiorgio Corporation; they were confident that the Union would not desert them. With unexpected courage, the small growers, too, stood staunchly behind the workers and were the first to announce that they would pay the $3 wage which was ultimately established throughout the Valley. This contrasts with an unorganized cotton pickers' strike in 1937, when the Associated Farmers forced the small growers to act as strike breakers even supplying them with pickaxe handles and admonitions to use them against the strikers.

Nor was this the only source of support given to the strikers. The merchants in rural towns, quick to realize the importance of this drastic wage cut imposed on their largest group of customers, immediately came to the strikers' aid. In one area, these businessmen hired an airplane which was used to distribute strike leaflets to the workers who had been shifted to isolated areas of large farms.

"Wetbacks" in Farm Labor: The situation of the "wetbacks"--illegal Mexican immigrants so-called because they get wet in wading across the shallow Rio Grande--has reached a critical level. This group is now so large that in some places it has lowered weekly wages to a shockingly low point. The two areas most affected by this illegal immigration are California's Imperial Valley and the Rio Grande Valley of Texas. Remembering the large pay checks of the war years and trying to escape starvation wages in Mexico, these illegals yearly glut the labor markets along the border. Early in 1949, thousands of Mexicans poured into Texas to work at chopping cotton, weeding and hoeing. This influx forced wages to thirty cents an hour and less. And this was only a forerunner of what was to happen when the cotton crop ripened.

In the Imperial Valley, the checkstubs of large firms serve to tell the story. A typical employee received the following payments from the Arena Imperial Co., located in Brawley, California:

For week ending January	7	$8.70
" " " "	13	5.10
" " " "	20	9.20

Yet this employee considered himself fortunate, for many of his friends and neighbors were not able to find employment which paid even this pittance.

The conditions of the "wetback" are not more comfortable than those of the worker he displaces. He lives in a crude hut or sometimes under a tree; buys his food from farm-owned commissaries at premium prices, and dares not complain for fear of deportation. His work day is 12 hours. In one section of the Imperial Valley, 461 "wetbacks" were turned over to the Immigration Service in one week for deportation and denied the wages that were due them.

Mexican Nationals: A second group of Mexicans employed in the agricultural fields of this nation is the Mexican nationals who are imported under legal contracts. In 1949, the agreement between the United States and Mexican governments was extended, and as of November 4, a total of 90,526 Mexicans had been placed on farm jobs (as compared to 30,000 during 1948). Of these, 71,067 were "wetbacks" who had been legalized rather than deported upon apprehension. Although the government agencies maintain that these Mexicans work under contract at "prevailing wage rates," investigation has shown that the contracts consistently specify wages lower than the average wage rates listed nationally by the Department of Agriculture. And the general labor wage has never been as high as that established by the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mexican-Americans are no less bitter about this situation than the displaced Okies and Arkies, but their pleas, as those of most minority groups, have fallen on deaf ears.

The situation may be changed this year, however. In December, the Federal Advisory Council to the Bureau of Employment Security recommended, against the strong opposition of employer groups, that no foreign farm labor be recruited during the coming year.

Health: California received brief but enlightening publicity in November when it was announced that there were 11 known children's deaths due to malnutrition in one county. A more appalling fact is that there were 28 similar deaths in the same county in the month of December which were not revealed. These statistics were not deliberately suppressed, but an investigation indicates that there seemed to be a tacit agreement among Californians that repeated publicity was "not desirable." There is a distinction between malnutrition and starvation, but it is equally unpleasant and heartbreaking for parents to watch their children fall prey to the fatal diseases common to lack of adequate food as to watch them die from lack of any food.

THE MID-SOUTH

The conditions of farm workers in the mid-south have seriously deteriorated during the past year. In the Mississippi Delta, the entire 1949 cotton crop was quickly gathered by a large army of migrants supplementing the local sharecroppers and laborers. There was no usual backlog for winter food and fuel in the new year. Today there is no cotton, and almost no food and fuel. Banks, cotton gin operators, and farm owners are extending no credit or "furnish" to sharecroppers and labor. The Welfare Departments are besieged by technically ineligible families in desperate need. The school free lunch programs are inundated with increased requests. One grocery owner in Lilbourn, Mo., tells of over 25 requests for food by penniless people on one Saturday afternoon. And one county relief agency in Mississippi reported over 620 applicants for relief in the first 18 days of December 1949, nearly twice the number reported for the full month of December 1948.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR FARM WORKERS

The National Farm Labor Union has done much to awaken political awareness among farm workers during the past two years. As a result, migrant workers especially are making an effort to regain their lost citizenship by establishing residence which would qualify them as voters.

At the sixteenth annual convention of the National Farm Labor Union, a minimum program for the aid of farm workers was adopted. Among the resolutions passed were the following:

1) President Truman called upon to abrogate the agreement with Mexican government for importing agricultural labor, and the government asked to make hiring of "wetbacks" illegal.
2) Counties and cities be prohibited from passing ordinances restricting free speech and civil liberties. Passage of FEPC by Congress.
3) Establishment of public works program for periods of unemployment, based on a calendar of work periods in agriculture to be mapped out with aid of State and Federal governments.
4) Housing and educational aid for farm workers.
5) Inclusion of farm workers in social security and minimum wage legislation.

As the agricultural economy of this country moves toward greater mechanization and large-scale farms, the Union asks that these industries be recognized for what they are and that they operate under the same restrictions as other factories. It seems evident that the Union and other organizations working for the improvement of conditions for agricultural workers will succeed only when the people of this country realize the vital urgency of the situation. The task of the National Sharecroppers Fund during 1950 is to help the Union and these organizations hasten the time when our agricultural workers can live as free, healthy and economically secure citizens.

The attached stories of families in Faulkner and Desha counties tell of successful adjustments made by Negro farmers in Arkansas.

June 1, 1950

ACCEPTING THE CHALLENGE

It was farm and home planning time, and Mr. Earl F. Pettyjohn, State Field Representative, District I, stopped by one Monday morning last fall to discuss with me the trends in patterns of agriculture, particularly how they would affect low-income cotton growing farm families. We concurred in one thing at the outset: "We've got to introduce and practice other agricultural enterprises, if our families are to survive".

At the close of our conference we reviewed a copy of a Farm Plan presented by Mr. Kenneth C. Bratcher, Faulkner County FHA Supervisor, for the Martin Walker family, Damascus, Arkansas. Yes, this plan spoke for itself. It revealed that the family and the supervisor were making a real effort to reorganize the Walker's farming plan. Read this story and see if you don't think they have struck upon a sound plan that should not only raise the economic status and standard of living of this family, but serve as an example for other families who see what is being done.

Mr. Elisha Wheeler and Mrs. Maude Banks, Negro Extension workers of Faulkner County who assisted Mr. Bratcher with this family, accompanied me on a visit with the Walkers last Tuesday. After seeing the small dairy unit and walking over the farm, we sat under a big oak tree in the back yard to talk about past experiences, present efforts, and future plans of the family. This is their story.

Mr. and Mrs. Walker, 50 and 48 years old respectively, have lived in Faulkner County all of their lives. They have one son, who is a student at AM&N College, Pine Bluff, learning to be a carpenter.

Mr. Walker said, "I jumped about from one farm to another, share-cropping, renting, rising and falling, barely paying out each year so I could get a "furnish" the next. My father owned the 88 acres now in my possession. He almost lost it three times before his death. The fourth mortgage he put on it was his last. Even though I had striven year after year to keep my little business going and help him to lift those mortgages, after his death I had to buy the land all over again, in a manner of speaking. But we are here and it is home. It was a scuffle to ever get this house built. My wife and I did day labor after cotton picking was over, and finally we made enough money to get it built."

Mrs. Walker said, "Wait a minute, Martin, and let me talk some". He smiled approvingly. She straightened her body and got comfortable on the old bench upon which she sat: "I hate to say this, but it's the truth. I was on the verge of running off, leaving this farm and Martin too, for I was tired of trying to make a living on cotton. Martin saw I was tired, too, so one night we got together and decided we'd go and talk with Mr. Bratcher, our supervisor, about setting up in dairy farming and almost no sooner said than done, for everybody knows we are hard workers and honest. We were just poor and getting poorer as long as we depended on cotton."

And here is the outgrowth of the Walker family's decision, effort, and cooperation, based on the fact that they had some experience with dairy cattle:

12 Jersey milk cows
1 Jersey bull
5 Poland China hogs
55 Chickens

A pasture program of:

11 Acres Bermuda
11 Acres Fescue
6 Acres Oats - Overseeded Rye Grass, Crimson & White Dutch Clover
6 Acres Sudan Grass
1 Acre Reseeding Crimson Clover
12 Acres Lespedeza
5 Acres Corn

There are two springs supplying water to the pond in the pasture.

Where 15 acres of cotton was once the chief cash crop, these rows are flattened and gladly bow to pasture grasses.

The Farmers Home Administration made the family a loan of $1900 which was used in this way:

Dairy Milk House	$500
Equipment	$800	(Including 2 milkers, 1 hot water heater, 2 vats for sterilizing utensils, 1 cooling system)
6 Cows to supplement 6 already owned	$600

This dairy project was begun last fall. Already the family has made an appreciable reduction of their indebtedness by making regular repayments twice a month from the sale of whole milk. They are also paying for stock in the association which markets the milk, the Midsouth Supply Association of Conway, Arkansas.

We decided to take pictures of this successful dairy enterprise and let other people see what is being done by farmers to meet the challenge in Arkansas. Some people have called me into their meetings to ask me what is meant by cotton allotments and how our farmers will make adjustments, so I wanted them to see at least one of the answers.

Present for this visit with the Walkers were: Mr. Kenneth C. Bratcher, Faulkner County FHA Supervisor; Mrs. Maude Davis, Home Demonstration Agent; Mr. Elisha Wheeler, County Agent; Rev. C. C. Walker, Pastor, Congregational Church; Mr. Lee Larkin, famous artist and painter, Charmaine Hotel, and Mr. J. L. Abernathy, Arkansas World photographer.

It was my pleasure last Wednesday to drop in on a meeting of the Faulkner County FHA Committee, composed of Mr. L. A. Jeffries, Mr. Ed Oliver, and Mr. W. H. McNair. These were the men who approved the loan for the Walker family. I expressed my gratitude in meeting a group of men with vision who have within their grasp a full knowledge of the agricultural needs and problems of the families who come to our organization for assistance and guidance. We had a lively exchange of ideas, with one of the members making this crowning statement: "It's been a pleasure to meet you and to know that our thinking is in accord. I'm the oldest member on the committee, in point of service, and our policy is that when an application comes before us, we look into it for several qualities - - need, reputation, merit, and the possibilities of repayment and lifting the economic status of the family". And as I backed out of the door I said, "Thank you, sir. I know what you mean."

As I hurried down the stairs, I kept saying over and over to myself, "No wonder something is being done about this thing in Faulkner County. There within this mesh of fine calibre of manly humanity were the pulsating efforts and guidance of both Mr. A. H. Wade, who was injured in an automobile accident shortly after the beginning of the project, and Mr. Pettyjohn, who followed through on the project, interweaving their gentlemanly qualities and skills with Mr. Bratcher, the County Committee, and the determination of the family - - the whole thing reflecting itself in an illumination and revelation of the objectives of the Farmers Home Administration".

This story tells of a large family left destitute by the ravages of the boll weevil, and how assistance is being extended by the Farmers Home Administration through the Disaster Loan Program. Story submitted by Mrs. Jennie Marbles, Home Management Supervisor, Desha County, Arkansas.

Pictures relating to this family and their activities are on the poster captioned "Meeting the Need via Disaster Loans".

A SHORT STORY OF "THE JEWEL FOSTERS"

This story in short depicts the real life of a sharecropper or renter and I hope when you have read it you can appreciate a man who wants and needs his own home.

Mr. and Mrs. Jewel Foster, ages 38 and 35, were both born on nearby farms out from McGehee, lived from childhood to manhood and womanhood on farms rented by their parents.

This couple married in 1931 and started farming for themselves as sharecroppers. Their first venture was on a farm located 3 miles west of McGehee, the Irwin farm. It was a bad crop year and the Fosters had a complete crop failure. One child was born. In the face of failure their heads were low, their hearts heavy, and their minds disturbed; but this did not discourage them from going on. They were determined to farm, and so in 1932 they moved to Drew County where they rented another farm. They planted 10 acres of cotton, and 12 acres of corn from which they made 5 bales of cotton and 150 bushels of corn. Another child was born.

Another year rolled around they decided to remain on this farm for 1934. It was a bad year and they made hardly enough to exist on -- no corn for feed stuff and only 4 bales of cotton. Rent had to be paid and children had to be fed. The family garden was only fair and a very small amount of food was canned. Another child was born.

In 1935 they moved to Chickasaw, a farm located west of McGehee, and worked as sharecroppers. They planted 8 acres of cotton and 4 acres of corn. Their crop yield was 5 bales of cotton and 4 loads of corn. You know the story of the sharecropper that year -- he only existed. Another child was born.

In 1936 they moved again, this time to Bayou Bartholomew, and experienced a failure again on 12 acres of cotton. Four bales of cotton was the yield. They had no corn and no other feed stuff -- still the life of a sharecropper. They remained on this farm two years. Two more children were born.

In 1938 and 1939, they found themselves on a farm back in Drew County, as sharecroppers again, no feed raised and only five bales of cotton produced on 17 acres of land. They had a good garden, however, and canned around 300 quarts of food. One child was born.

In 1940 the family moved to South Bayou Bartholomew, a farm known as the "L". After farming here seven years, they found themselves still sharecroppers with no money saved, no feed on hand, and no foodstuff canned. Only two children were born.

Again our family moved in 1948 to Bayou Mason as renters. They remained here two years on the farm and produced six bales of cotton on 12 acres. Their corn crop failed, but they raised and preserved some foodstuff for family use. This year was an encouragement to the family, but they moved again in 1949 to a farm west of Desha Farms. Then the boll weevil disaster hit Arkansas and other Southern States in the cotton area. The Fosters were among the victims in Desha County and they applied for and received a Disaster Loan from the Farmers Home Administration.

Now they are renting and their crops consist of soybeans, hay, truck patches, peas, peanuts, melons, chickens, as well as corn and cotton. They have two cows and a start in hogs. Their farming has changed for the better; but their home surroundings are poor. This family needs more help. We can help them, can't we?

This story, submitted by Mr. Richard Holderby, Desha County FHA Supervisor, points up the results obtained through farm reorganization.

THE MCDANIEL FAMILY

Route 1, Tillar, Desha County, Arkansas

The family consists of the father, the mother, one daughter aged 21, and four boys aged 17, 15, 13, and 10. The McDaniels have been farmers all their lives. The husband and wife were born in Conway County and farmed there until 1933, when they moved to Ashley County. In Ashley County they sharecropped and share rented cotton crops. In 1939 they moved to Desha Farms Project and operated a small unit under a Lease and Purchase Contract until 1944. In 1944, they purchased a 75-acre tract of land three miles east of McGehee.

This family had always depended on cotton for their income, and although they were good cotton farmers their income was never enough to meet the needs of the family and each year they found it necessary to borrow money for farm and home operations. The McDaniels realized they would never get very far up the economic ladder with cotton alone as their source of income. They were both interested in livestock and had accumulated eight or ten head of cattle, most of which were very inferior in quality. They were trying to sell milk and cream, but were discouraged because of the lack of profit.

In the summer of 1949, John McDaniel discussed his farm problem with the Desha County FHA Supervisor, Mr. Richard H. Holderby, and asked for his advice. The supervisor went over the farm with him and recommended a complete reorganization of his farming business. The family indicated their willingness to cooperate in carrying out the plan. As a result the farm was platted and each field was given a number. After a thorough study of the farm and the various possible enterprises, McDaniel and the supervisor worked out a Farm Plan and a Long-Time Farm Plan which would put to the best use the land and family resources. A chart was then worked out to show the rotation of crops and the use of the soil building crops.

With the plans completed it was found that the family would need additional funds to carry out the plan. In view of this need, the Farmers Home Administration advanced a loan for:

Seed	$150
Fertilizer	150
Milk Cows	600
Fencing	150
Milk Cooler	100
	$1,500

In studying the reorganization plans, the family realized they had twelve important jobs to do and kept them in mind. The jobs were as follows:

1. Dispose of undesirable cows and replace with high producing milk cows.

2. Build milk barn which would meet requirements of State Health Department for the sale of Grade A milk.

3. Improve pasture by overseeding Bermuda grass with suitable grasses and clovers.

4. Increase production of feed by increased acreage and better production methods.

5. Breed cows to purebred sires.

6. Dispose of scrub sows and replace with purebred. Breed sows to purebred boar.

7. Provide separate pasture for hogs.

8. Provide supplemental summer pastures for cows and hogs.

9. Give better care to livestock in order to have healthy animals.

10. Improve laying flock by culling and replacing.

11. Improve drainage by farm ditches and in cooperation with neighbors construct a drainage ditch in the near future.

12. Understand and carry out the Farm and Home Plans.

With a full knowledge and understanding of the reorganization plan, the entire family entered into the program of work with enthusiasm and determination. The results of their efforts are now beginning to show. They are selling Grade A milk to the local dairy. They have 12 good Jersey milk cows, a greatly improved pasture, a good herd of hogs, and a good flock of purebred laying hens. Never again will the McDaniels depend solely on cotton. Their reorganization plan is paying off and they are now on a firm road to that goal of true Farm Ownership.

LONG-TIME FARM AND HOME PLAN
(Years Covered 1950-1953)

John McDaniel - 75 Acres
Desha County, Arkansas

PROPOSED MAP OF FARM AFTER PLAN IS IN EFFECT

2 - LONG-TIME FARM AND HOME PLAN

John McDaniel - 75 Acres
Desha County, Arkansas

MAJOR CHANGES AND IMPROVEMENTS TO BE PUT INTO EFFECT:

Overseed 27 Acre pasture with White Dutch and Hop Clover and Dallas Grass, 1950.

Clip pasture to control weeds and keep plants growing and tender.

Spray cattle to control flies. Use Health Department recommendations.

Interplant 15 Acres of corn with soybeans. Hog down part.

Work out rotation for crops, working in lespedeza meadow. Rotate cotton and corn each year, lespedeza meadow every two years.

Plant twelve acres vetch following cotton each year.

Construct net wire fence around outside of farm, 1950.

Purchase portable fence (electric) to use in rotational grazing in fall of 1949 and 1950.

Plant and work into rotation 6 acres summer supplemental pasture, using either lespedeza or sweet Sudan Grass.

Use complete fertilizer under cotton and corn. Sidedress corn with nitrate of soda at rate of 100# per acre. Top dress oats with at least 100 pounds per acre of nitrate of soda.

Remove brush from 7 acres of pasture, 1950.

LIVESTOCK:

Increase dairy herd to 10 cows, 1950, 15 cows by 1952.
Sell beef animals and stay with dairying, fall 1949.
Breed cows to registered sire.
Keep two of best heifer calves for replacement each year.
Keep laying flock of 50 hens, using pullets each year.
Keep two broodsows and raise feed to be hogged off.
Breed sows as to farrow two litters per year, one in spring and one in fall.
Sell hogs as finished animals.

FAMILY LIVING:

Produce all food we can on our farm.
Produce enough eggs, meat, and milk for home use.
Attend church and Sunday School.
Keep children in school all year.
Take part in all community activities.
Plant and work garden according to recommended practices for planting, seeding, fertilization, cultivation, and insect control.
Have house sprayed with DDT, to control flies and mosquitoes.
Can surplus vegetables, fruits and meats for home use.
Can enough to meet needed food requirements according to canning chart.

Dear Mr. Watts:

I am greatly heartened by your letter of August 21. A most kind and thoughtful act.

Here is what I have written in to the Fund. I send you separately copies of the supporting materials, though I omit the audit, copies of which are scarce.

We are not yet quite desperate, though I must say it is hard to see where the rest of this year's money and more than a part of next year's will come from. A goodly sum from The National Sharecropper Fund would do a lot toward relieving our worries and letting us do our job instead of beg dimes.

The National Sharecropper Fund

Dear Sirs:

Could our Council get some help from The National Sharecropper Fund?

I could detail at great length what the Council is and what it does. As a short cut, if you will let us, I send these two good stories from recent issues of the New York Herald Tribune, plus other published materials and a copy of our last annual audit -- that for 1949.

One of the basic things we work at is the improvement of the condition of that major part of the Southern people who still get their living by agriculture, and of the major part of those who are made poor and dependent by bad conditions of tenure or ownership of farms too small for reasonable support.

I am myself to some degree familiar with agricultural conditions, and many who have worked closely with the Council share a special interest in bettering the condition of the farming people of the South. I call particular attention to Arthur Raper's pamphlet, Machines in the Cotton Fields, the section on rural housing in our pamphlet on Housing in the South, the article on land tenure in an issue of New South a couple of years back, and a recent fly-sheet on small-town slum clearance. This last was of particular interest to the National Farm Labor Union.

The Council's need arises from the disbandment of the Julius Rosenwald Fund, which put in, in earlier years, about half of what kept the Council going.

We have tried our best, last year and this, to replace that sum with individual contributions almost entirely from people scattered over the South. We have brought the amount of those individual contributions, over and above dues, received in 1950 already to approximately $10,000. That is a pretty good sum to come in in fives and tens from people with no great means and with many appeals to their interests. Still, we are $12,000 or $15,000 short of enough to meet the budget even for minimum operation.

We will be hopeful that you can include us in your next appeal,* and I will dare to hope in addition that you can find some amount unallocated this year, which would ease our most pressing needs.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell
Executive Director

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

Rumor has come to me that there is a possibility of the Southern Regional Council disolving because of lack of funds. I certainly hope that this is not true and that you will be able to continue your very valuable work.

In any event I am sure that the Council can use funds of whatever size and the purpose of this letter is to urge you to send immediately a request for a grant to The National Sharecropper Fund, 40 East 49 Street, New York 17, N.Y. As a member of its Board I will do what I can to see that it gets favorable consideration. Send a copy of this request and accompanying material to me at the WDL.

As you probably know, the NSF does not have very much money but it is planning a fall appeal based on an over-all survey of present conditions in the South and I am sure that if it has material available about your work it will be willing to include your organization as one of the organizations that would receive the proceeds of the appeal. Dr. Charles S. Johnson
Fisk University
Nashville, Tennessee

Dear Dr. Johnson:

The National Sharecroppers Fund has promised the Council $1500.00 to finance a project for getting out a pamphlet on Southern State laws on farm land tenure.

My idea was to give a quick summary of these laws, then of the nature of the laws, then to show the ways in which they fall short of reasonable protection of people and of land, and then to give a model statute. We thought perhaps to model statute would have in it the idea of an enacted lease which would be deemed to be the terms on which farm land was rented, in the absence of a written lease in other terms.

Charles Mangum at Chapel Hill has a book which the University of North Carolina Press has agreed to print. It mostly reviews the court cases on farm land tenure. Then there is the southwestern book by Hofsommer. Can you tell me where your work on it stands?

What we would want to print would be a 25¢ pamphlet. The man who runs the University of North Carolina Press quieted my fears that such a pamphlet would stand in the light of Mangum's forthcoming book by saying that no 25¢ pamphlet will compete with a $7.50 book. So maybe the Council and your own work could find some accommodation on that principle.

In any case, please let me know what you think it would be useful for us to do.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

Mr. Calvin Kytle

Dear Calvin:

Some corner or other of that justifiably great Farm Bureau outfit puts on a program of local meetings of farmers discussing current topics. I have for years heard their programs praised. We have got in the cook a pamphlet on reform of State legislation about farm land tenure. I have some notion of so casting it as to make it useful for farmers' discussion meetings.

Can you reach to the guy who knows the tricks of how such casting is done and a[illegible]n to send me a couple of good samples, and if the good man [illegible]me, a letter of advice?

The pamphlet [illegible] about 32 pages. It will discuss the way Southern State[illegible]ure laws got on to the books, what they do and what they d[illegible] will provide a model statute (probably carrying the ide[illegible] statutory lease which would be deemed to be the terms upon [illegible]n farm land was rented, in the absence of a written lease to the contrary).

I have found some good people who are working on it, and the National Sharecroppers Fund has promised us money that will probably be enough to get it out.

We heave and struggle, and yet live. The latest event is that Roy Harris's paper has called us "Communist-front." We have called him "ignorant" and have demanded a retraction from the paper. I had just about got my hide hardened to being called a gradualist, when suddenly we become communists.

We miss you and Liz.

Ohio State University years ago did a noble job of educating (by dint of a most complicated network of partial scholarships) a boy and a girl from among the Indianoid people at Pembroke, North Carolina. The staff people who would remember all that are probably dead or moved along, but I recall that a very large University bent attention to the particular needs of two people and met those needs mighty well.

Hook on to the people who operate the Friends of the Land. The head office is there in Columbus. Russell Lord would pay you tiny sums for stuff written for The Land. It would get you known to a whole new circle of useful people.

And forget not, as you circulate among the well-to-do, the opportunities you may have for convincing the Gotrocks about the needs of honorable the SRC.

I am still sure that your pamphlet for us was the best single piece of work the show has done in thirty years.

Mr. Albert Cotton

Dear Mr. Cotton:

That was kind of you to give me such a good full answer.

Here are some answers:

The Sharecroppers Fund people have not yet come through with the money (which they are still raising), but I expect it soon. We might set April 1 as a deadline for copy.

I should think the pamphlet ought to contain about 32 pages.

Style would certainly have to be for general interest. Perhaps it would be well to cast it so as to make it particularly useful to discussion groups of farmers. I am writing to some experts on how to do that.

I agree with you that reform of tenancy laws won't do the job. But it is an important and neglected part of a general betterment of farming security in the country, and particularly in the South. Off the bat, I would plunk for putting the effort still into getting State legislation. But the legal and policy point about Federal legislation ought to be clearly set forth.

I get to Richmond every now and then, though I haven't any immediate plan for being there. Still, I would suppose that before January is over I will be for this reason or that in Richmond. I will of course come to see you. But meanwhile, I hope you can go ahead with an outline.

The longer I live, the more instances I find of Farm Security people doing good jobs in the old spirit. Did you know about Pete Hudgens' little Farm Security in Venezuela? It now spreads to Brazil and Ecuador and so on. And I dropped in at ECA the other day and found a familiar face in every other office.

December 3, 1950

Dr. George S. Mitchell
Southern Regional Council
63 Auburn Ave. N. E.
Atlanta, Ga.

Dear Dr. Mitchell,

I am very much interested in your project for a phamphlet on Southern Farm Tenancy law, andwould be delighted to co-operate in writing it. I have been doing some work along this line in connection with my S.J.D. thesis for the Yale Law School, andit would not be too difficult to get some of the Southern material into shape, together with background comparative material.

In view of some other things I am committed to do, I would like to have some idea of when you would like to have the phamphlet ready for publication, and about what you would consider an appropriate length. Also, there is the matter of style--I assume that it should be written to be a general interest, rather than as a technical legal publication.

I suppose that the best procedure would be for me to send you a rather sketchy rough draft of what I think that we should have, in places indicating just what information I think we should have that I do not have in detail, and proceed from that to work out the finished product.

In general, it is my view that while Southern tenancy laws, are, in many of their details outrageous, and that American tenancy law isn't particularly suited to the needs of agriculture, that just tinkering with tenancy law alone won't meet the problem. I'm inclined to think that bad credit arangements, both for operation and purchase, have as much to do with producing the present situation as the tenancy laws--though they tie up together through the landlord's lien. The solution I would advocate is pretty much the old Farm Security program with a real opportunity for all successful tenant's to purchase farms, and more experiments with co-ops where there are economic advantages to be gained by preserving large operations.

I have no doubt, of course, of the constitutionality of state reform measures such as those proposed by the President's Committee on Farm Tenancy. (I discussed that problem at some length in the Farm Tenancy symposium published by Law and Contemporary Problems in 1937, with which you are undoubtedly familiar. It is just that I don't think that this approach is presently politically feasible, or that it will do the whole job. The fact that I don't believe that reform in tenancy law will be a complete solution, however, does not indicate that I feel that a phamplet on tenancy law isnot well worth doing. In fact, I have felt for some time that a technical legal study of just how we got in the situation that we are in would be a great value in clarifying the situation. I've always been particularly fascinated by the point that most of the legal precedents upon which the sharecropper system was built come from early New England cases, yet New England, of course never developed anything remotely like the Southern tenancy system.

Another point that I think should be made now is that all of the early work in the field assumed that legislative reform would necessarily have to be through state action. In 1937 we were afraid, both with regard to tenancy legislation and soil conservation legislation, the the Supreme Court might throw out state legislation, and it was unanimously agreed that the subject was one reserved to the states. Today, I think it is pretty clear that federal farm tenancy legislation or soil conservation legislation, would be upheld--particularly if it were directed to minimum standards or tied in with federal programs, which is the only sort that Congress would be even remotely likely to pass anyway. In view of the fact that all the early writing in the field assumes that it is a state matter, I think it would be well worth while to point out that this is not necessarily true, even though it may be years before anything comes of the suggestion.

I would like very much to have an opportunity to talk with you about this project, if you areever in Richmond. I have no plans to be in Atlanta before September of next year, but I do have to go to Chicago immediately after Christmas, and if I have time, I would like to go to North Carolina before I return here. If I do it that way, I might arrange to come through Atlanta and stop for a day or half a day.

Your letter indicated that you didn't remember me at all personally, which is natural, since we barely met. However, I was in the Farm Security Division of the Solicitor's office in Washington from 1938 until the spring of 1942, and again after I returned from the army in the fall of 1945 until 1948. I was in the Land Policy Division there from 1934 to 1938. This may account for my feeling that credit reform is as necessary as legal reforms, if anything is actually to be accomplished.

Sincerely,

Albert H. Cotton

Mr. Charles Mangum
510 East Franklin Street
Chapel Hill, North Carolina

Dear Mr. Mangum:

I am still awaiting word from the National Sharecroppers Fund that they have raised their budget for this coming year and will duly make their promised payment to us. You will remember that we hope to do a pamphlet on Southern State legislation on farm tenure with the proceeds.

My general idea is to review the history of Southern State legislation to bring out the point that the laws were passed in the late 'sixties when the desperate need was to put a stricken country back to work and then the work people on the land could not have read written leases if they had had them. (I daresay many landlords couldn't, either!) I would not be concerned to take up the history of the laws State by State, but rather to present a general picture with notation of the way in which this or that State varied significantly from the pattern.

Then there should be a discussion of the advantages and disadvantages of the system we have. Of course, it is flexible, but certainly it takes a sad toll of humanity and soil fertility. It may be that at this point some of your case law would come in particularly handy. Somewhere there should be mention of European experience and solutions. I suppose the idea would be to show that modest recommendations for change here are modest; that change elsewhere has been far more drastic than what we propose. Then there could be a model statute. And that would be about all.

Somewhere there ought to be discussion of the difficulties in the way of a mere tenant making the shift nowadays from cotton to cows. If it takes five years to build good pasture and many thousands of dollars to buy a good herd, how can a man on an oral lease or on an annual written lease take a chance? Of course he can't. So the answer must be that it is only owners who can take advantage of modern farming. Thus is the law fulfilled that "from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath."

I am told that Charles Johnson at Fisk has done some unpublished work along this line, and also that a man named Albert Cotten, now teaching law at Richmond College, knows a good deal about it. I have written to Charles Johnson for his advice, and I am writing to Cotten for advice. I would like to confirm our conversation of six weeks or so ago and ask you to do for a fee some part of a manuscript toward the pamphlet. I can't make a binding undertaking until the Council receives a grant from the National Sharecroppers Fund, but I can ask you to begin to work it up in your mind, and I am satisfied that I can send you a couple of hundred dollars for your part of the manuscript. One of the things I should like you to put your mind on is a model statute. I believe we talked about having it provide a statutory lease which should be deemed to be the terms upon which farm land is rented unless a document to the contrary is shown.

I don't want to fall into the trap of advocating every benefit to the tenant. The landlord has his grievances and proper claims, too. I know it would be hard in practice to get for the landlord compensation for damages done by the tenant, but I should think the law ought to provide for that. That matter could, of course, be fixed by elaborate provisions for posting bond, but I suppose that is silly.

I would want to be free to use a pretty heavy editorial hand in putting together the final manuscript, but you would be fully consulted on whatever changes we might propose.

It is good of you to be willing to put your thinking on to this proposal.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell
Executive Director

Dear Mr. Cotten:

I started tracking you down through Jim Maddox, who gave me some leads. I then wrote to Shelby Robert, who told me to write you here. I hope it finds you.

Jim says you have done a lot of work on the law of farm land tenure in the Southern States.

Our Council has been proposing for some years to get out a pamphlet on that subject. We have never had the money to do it. A few months ago, along came the National Sharecroppers Fund, which has promised us a small sum toward doing a pamphlet of that kind. They have yet to raise the money, but I think they will raise it and pay it.

What I had in mind is a pamphlet that would review the history of the Southern State legislation on farm land tenure and bring out the usual point that the laws were passed in the late 'sixties to put a stricken country to work, and at a time when the work people on the land were illiterate and could not read written leases. Then it seems to me there should be some tale of the human and agricultural disabilities imposed by these laws. We are all familiar with the toll of family and community life taken by shifting tenancy, but we are less familiar with the ravages of the land produced by uncertain tenure and the practice of no compensation for improvement (and no damages for destruction). There should be a brief discussion of experience abroad, and then perhaps a model statute should be set out. It may be needful to talk some about case law under existing statutes.

I am a book farmer only, but it seems to me that the present land tenure laws in the South make it practically impossible for a tenant to shift over to a cow economy. The agriculturalists talk about five years to build pastures. How can a tenant on an annual oral lease undertake to build five-year pastures and then invest in cows when he may get thrown off any year? Thus, the chance to change over goes to the fortunate ones who own land, and we repeat the old story, "from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath."

There is, of course, a side interest in all this in the big Northern cities which get an influx of people whose insecurity at home is partly tied up with these laws. But I am not one that would wish to nail down on to the land people who are redundant to its good cultivation.

I can't write the pamphlet, though I suppose I may fairly use a certain editorial judgment about it. Jim Maddox tells me you could do the whole thing or, at any rate, a lot of it. There is also Charles Mangum at Chapel Hill, who has a book almost into the press on the case law. I understand, too, that at Fisk Dr. Charles Johnson has done a good deal of unpublished work in this field. And Jim Maddox told me that the BAE nearly cooked a study on it but didn't finish.

Assuming that the Council gets the money promised it toward the project, I could pay a hundred or two dollars for some of the writing.

Will you at any rate take the trouble to advise me as to whether this is a good thing to go forward with and in what way, and whether you would be willing to put your knowledge and thought into it?

For identifying me, you can start with the fact that I was born in the house where you teach law. You can take it from there.

Sincerely,

Dear George:

From the best information available, Albert Cotten is now teaching at the University of Richmond Law School in Richmond. I could not find a definite address for him, but I believe the above would reach him.

Dear Shelby:

Can you out of your own head or out of Marshall Harris's head tell me ho to get hold of Albert Cotton? I have a promise of $1500.00 to do a pamphlet on State land tenure laws.

Sorry to miss you, but I will go see Miriam and S and M. Tell Miriam I will occupy the Cosmos Club, though I am grateful for her willingness to take me in.

You know I made a commencement speech at Tuskegee last May. White people were scarce on the grounds. A month ago I saw a Tuskegee graduate (our friend Harry Wright) in New York. He had had a visit from somebody who had been at the commencement. "Man oh man, they had some Georgia Cracker up there was giving 'em fits!"

People to work on the Sharecropper pamphlet.

Jim Maddox told me in mid-November that the best guy is Albert Cotton.

He is a lawyer, sometime partner of Monroe Oppenheimer. His father was a professor at Duke. Albert Cotton taught at LSU last year, 1949-1950. He knows this subject. Is doing a thesis now at Yale on laws on farm tenancy. Perhaps a bit peculiar, but brilliant. Sometime newspaper writer. Contributed to the issue of Law and Contemporary Problems (Duke University) which addressed itself to farm land tenure. He teams up with Marshall Harris at USDABAE.

Cotton helped write the Arkansas statute and the short-lived Iowa Law. This had in it a compensation provision but the legislature killed it after two years. BAE once had a project on land tenure.

Dear Guy:

Many thanks for your dope about Charles Mangum. I can quite understand his position and think it on the whole a generous arrangement.

I have written him as enclosed.

I find that a young law professor named Albert Cotton, now teaching in Richmond, used to work in the Department of Agriculture and has done a lot in this field. He and I have been corresponding, and he is supposed now to be writing a draft of a pamphlet.

I hear also from Charles Johnson that he and others at Fisk have done a good deal in this field. I have propositioned him for permission to bleed his work, but have not yet had CSJ's reply.

I have written to the Ohio Farm Bureau people about how best to cast such a pamphlet into a form that will make it useful for farmers' discussion groups.

So all in all, I think things might well come to hand.

The Executive Committee meets tomorrow and we are a-flutter with reports and sandwiches.

Best to you and Guion.

Dear Mr. Mangum:

Guy wrote me about the thinking you have done on the letter I sent.

I think the offer you make is a generous one, and we certainly take you up on it. I have not yet received the money that the National Sharecroppers Fund has promised to pay, but I have sufficient faith in them to make you now a promise to pay you a hundred dollars for permission to us to read your manuscript (corrected or uncorrected is immaterial to us). We would suppose under this arrangement that we could use in the final pamphlet ideas from your manuscript, and conceivably brief verbatim quotes. But we would not use your material in direct or indirect form without advance written permission from you.

I have been working with Albert Cotton, who is now teaching law at Richmond, and he is doing an outline toward a pamphlet.

I hear also that Charles Johnson has done a good deal of work in this field, and I have asked permission to draw on his work.

I put in an extra copy of this in case you want to send it on to Lambert Davis.

With every good wish,

Sincerely,

Dear George:

Just a quick note with regard to your negotiations with Charles Mangum. He came to see me day before yesterday, bringing your letter along. We had a good talk, and I promised to write you his sentiments as follows:

1. He is so "fed up" with the work on his book on the laws of farm tenancy that he cannot bring himself to consent to undertake your proposition. He is tired, is still not very well, and he wants to take a vacation from research for a while.

2. The more he thinks about the model lease law, the more he doesn't want to attempt it.

3. He is interested in the SRC idea and he hopes the staff will go ahead with it. He could make available shortly a corrected copy of the manuscript, or later (in the spring) a set of galley proofs, for someone to work from. Lambert Davis approves of this, Mangum says. Mangum would naturally expect an honorarium for use of the material, and he suggests a hundred dollars.

Well, there you are. I tried to convince him that he ought to go ahead and do the write-up for you, but no go.

If I can help any further on this, let me know. There are some other matters I should write about, but I will wait until I am out from under the quarterly grade reports and Christmas shopping.

All good wishes.

Dear Dr. Johnson:

I have some idea of how busy you are, but do put somebody at work toward making a decision about the land tenure reforms I wrote you about November 20.

I can see coming up an opportunity to shape a pamphlet that will be particularly useful to the program of the Committee on Land Tenure of the Home Missions Section of the National Council of Churches.

They are preparing to hold in a good many cities, if they can work it out, one-day interdenominational institutes among the rural churches on land tenure.

I have found a young law teacher named Albert Cotton, now in Richmond, who is preparing a manuscript for us. And Charles Mangum at Chapel Hill has promised to let us read his manuscript.

The National Sharecroppers Fund has made a partial payment of their grant to us, so we begin to suppose that the pamphlet can be put together soon.

Dear Mr. Valien:

I do greatly thank you for your long and careful letter about the work done already at Fisk on land tenure laws.

I hope to have an outline of our pamphlet completed within a few weeks. At that time I would like to propose that I or someone else from the Council be permitted to bring our outline up to Fisk and stack it up against your work and, with your permission, avail ourselves of your already completed research in order that we would not go over again ground as to which you have already collected the facts. Presumably our final manuscript would carry notation that we had been kindly given access to the Fisk material, as well as the work of Charles Mangum at Chapel Hill and Albert Cotton in Richmond. I realize the delicacy of proposing to tap your work when it is near publication. Mangum is in the same boat, but he and the University of North Carolina Press have taken the position that a twenty-five cent pamphlet would not stand in the light of a six-dollar book. I myself think that the pamphlet would increase the sale of a full-length book.

I do wish you would discuss this whole matter with any others concerned with your manuscript and be prepared to tell me later on what degree of help from your materials would be considered proper.

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

Dr. Johnson has asked me to write you regarding the work which he and I have prepared on landlord-tenant relations in the Southern States.

The manuscript which Dr. Johnson and I have done deals with the following ten states: Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee and Texas. It begins with a brief discussion of the land tenure laws of three states which represent one extreme and two states which represent the other extreme with respect to attempts to protect the interests of tenants.

Following this there is a discussion of some of the principal features which are usually included in landlord-tenant laws: the contract, responsibility for repairs, removal of emblements, fixtures and improvements, deterioration, destruction and waste, freedom of cropping and disposal of produce, and rent adjustment. Later discussions treat the legal status of sharecroppers and share-tenants, the landlord's lien, and distress and disturbance. The manuscript also includes a chart listing some major aspects of landlord-tenant laws of each of the ten states.

There is a chapter making comparisons with England and Wales and one which deals with proposals for improving landlord and tenant relationships.

There is also an appendix which contains (1) a digest of landlord-tenant laws and major court decisions of each of the ten states, and (2) a definition of legal words and phrases relating to landlord and tenant relations.

While the manuscript deals primarily with the legal aspects, there is an integration of some social data as well as some social interpretation of the laws.

The manuscript needs some revision and additional work. The digest of laws needs to be checked to determine whether or not there have been changes since it was originally compiled, and the section on proposals for improvements needs to be revised. Consideration might be given also to including Florida, Virginia and Kentucky with the other ten states. Some other minor editorial changes are also necessary. We have all the original material here, and these revisions and additions would not be too difficult for us.

I hope that this will give you some idea as to the nature of our work. Please let us know how you think we might be helpful to you on this valuable project.

With best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

Dear Dr. Mitchell,

Here is the rough draft, and it is a very rough one, that I promised to send you before I left for my trip. It will, however, give you an idea of what I have in mind.

I think it needs, at least, some concrete illustration of what I am talking about. Perhaps we should have in reserve some scholarly documention, since some of my broad statements are subject to exception, but what I am primarily thinking of is some concrete illustration that will make the story more interesting. However, when we decide what we want to use, it will not be too much trouble to get those.

I have in mind three more sections, which I didn't have time to do even in this very rough draft form; These are:

1. A discussion of the Report of the Presidents Committee on Farm Tenancy, with some discussion of what the Farm Security Administration actually did, and an analysis of some to the reasons why the recommendations for state action never did catch on.
2. A survey of just what the condition of the southern farm tenant is now. This is the part that I need help on--I know very little about what the war and post-war periods have actually produced.
3. An outline of a program for the future--another matter that I don't regret having not written yet, since I think that that also should be discussed more.

I will arrive in Atlanta on Sunday evening, at about 7:10 p.m., and I will call you at your home from the station. I shall also be delighted to accept the invitation to stay at your house.

I will certainly enjoy seeing you again, and I'm delighted at the opportunity to discuss this phamplet with you in detail. I trust that we can make an outline of what else needs to be done, and have the completed job ready very soon.

Sincerely,

Albert H. Cotton

P.S. I don't like the title I have here - I'm sure we can think of something better

TheSharecropper and the Law

Legally, as well as economically, the troubles of the Southern farm tenant and sharecropper go back to the period immediately after the Civil War. Prior to the war, the South had developed a system of agriculture that worked. The most productive land was in the hands of large planters, who worked their land with slaves. The system had its injustices, even its brutalities, but from the standpoint of farm management, it worked.

Even in those days, there was a serious soil conservation problem--but it was not the result of legal insecurity on the land. It was the result of the temptation of cheap new land to the west--part of the prodigal wasteof natural resources, which was typical of the new country.

The Civil War swept this established system away. Indeed, the Emancipation Proclamation was a war measure, designed to weaken the south, and issued without thought of what would become of the newly freed slaves. Not until after the war did anyone consider the problem of the economic reconstruction of Southern agriculture.

Only one idea of any consequence came out of the North. This found expresssion in the slogan, "Forty Acres and a Mule," and was a proposal to do just that--confiscate the property of the Southern landowners, and give each of the newly freed Negroes forty acres of land and a mule. Thus, he could set up as an independent farmers, on the model of the poineers who were then taking up the lands of the Mid-West. Expressed in crude terms, and its advocates never got further, the idea was obviously impractical. Tbx become a sucessful farm operator, the newly freed Negroes needed much more than the minimum acreage of land and equipment as a gift. Perhaps the idea would have worked, if it had been thought through, and accompanied by a program of credit, education and supervision. But in those days there was no Department of Agriculture. The ideax of agricultural extension work was in the future. In any event, nothing practical was proposed, and nothing at all was done.

Fromthe end of the war until 1876, the sole endeavor of the North, acting through the Republican Party, was to exploit the Negro and to permanently attach him to the Republican party. "Reconstruction" to the conqueror, was an era of destruction, with no contribution to the rebuilding of the Southern economy.

The South was thus left to work out the problem of rebuilding its agriculture on a new basis, without help, without intelligent suggestion, and without any models of sucessful experience in rebuilding under similar circumstances.

The Abolitionists, in so far as the had thought about the problem at all, had happilly assumed that the slaves once freed, would go to work for wages, just as Northern workers did. In their moral fervor, the practical problems of transition had not ocurred to them.

Perhaps, if emancipation had come legally, without a war, the transition to free wage labor could have been made. Wages, undoubtedly, would have been shockingly low, but they could have been paid. The war made this impossible. Literally, all that the landowners had was land. Their money was not worthless Confederate money. Their investments had largely been in slaves, now freed. Investments in Southern industry, not of great importance at best, were largely swept away. All they had was land, and some farm equipment.

The ex-slaves were even worse off. All they owned was the clothes on their backs. They did not even have money to buy food--indeed, in all their lives they had never had any money, and if they had had, it would have been worthless too.

It was out of the necessities of this situtation that the sharecropping system, which still plagues the south today arose. The landlord could, at exhorbitant rates, get enough credit to feed the ex-slaves until a crop could be made and sold. He did have land, which could be worked. The ex-slave had nothing.

There is no contemporary evidence that anybody thought much about the legal aspects of the arrangement at the beginning. Actually, the plan might well have been devised by a lawyer. Contracts, similar to the sharecropping contract, were known to the law. They had been interpreted and enforced, in both English and American decisions, before the Civil War, and, curiously enough, especially in the New England states. Nowhere, however, had any agricultural economy, at least in the Anglo-American tradition, been built on the almost universal use of such contracts. They had remained, exceptional, though legally possible, arrangements.

The essential feature of the sharecropping contract is that a landowner hires a laborer, for a year or crop season, under a promise to pay his wages at one time, at the end of the year, in a share of the crop, rather than in cash. Usually, the right to occupy a shack is included in the contract. It is strictly an employment contract, and it is assumed that the laborer will work under the direction of the landlord, and that the crop will belong to the landlord.

The South added another feature to the contract--the landlords agreement to furnish food to the sharecropper, the cost of which would be deducted from his share of the crop when it was sold. This too, was a modification of a familiar idea. From colonial days, Southern agriculture had lived too largely on credit for its own good. Prior to the war, many landlords had habitually borrowed money to make their crops and feed their slaves, and the furnish system was merely an extension of this system to the laborer.

At this time, the country had had no experience with widespread farm tenancy. The American tradition had been that of the independent farmer, operating his own family farm. This had been the ideal preached by Thomas Jefferson. It had been the dream behind the migration to America to begin with, and the further migration to the west. In New York, there had been large estates, operated by tenants, as a heritage from the days of the Dutch, but the people rebelled against the system, and attempted to break it up in the new state constitution adopted in 1848. Inthe light of later developments in agriculture, it is interesting to note that the device chosen was the prohibition of the long term lease.

It is unfair, then, to believe that anyone anticipated the impoverishment of the region that the sharecropping system would bring in its wake. Indeed, there is every reason to suppose that the landlords would have preferred the conventional type of tenancy--where the landlord rents his land, preferably for cash in advance, turns everything over to the tenant, and retires from the picture. But this was obviously an impractical arrangement. One of the major difficulties to be met was that the ex-slave had no cash. Another was that he had no experience in management.

Tenancies of this type were known throughout the country, and, indeed, had been recognized by the common law for centuries. In fact, many of the plantation operators were tenants as to all or part of their lands. There were tenants among the smaller operators in the South, and, through the country, usually for short periods, it was customary to rent lands where the owner did not wish to operate them.

In agriculture, a modification of this system was popular. Instead ofpaying cash rent, either in advance or after harvest, the crop was divided between the landlord and tenant at the end of the year. Thus the landlord and tenant shared the risks of fluctuating prices, weather, and crop yields. This arrangement was popular because it resulted in a sharing of risks, and was felt to be inherently fair. Indeed, in recent years, business enterprises have adopted in from agriculture, in the widely-popular "percentage lease," where the rent for a store is paid in a percentage of the sales, rather than in a fixed sum.

There is a vast difference, both legally andpractically between "farming on shares" and "sharecropping." In the share-tenancy, the tenant receives possession of the land. It is his crop, and he is the manager. He owes the landlord a share of the crop as rent. The contract presupposes that he has farming equipment, and either cash or credit with which to make the crop.

Theoretically, the sharecropping contract is one which no laborer would make if he could work on any other terms. He is forced to share the risks of his employer--he gets no pay if the crop fails or the market drops. He works all year, only to find himself in debtfor the food which he has eaten, and he didn't get much food at that. Even in the worst depression conditions, it has never been suggested in this country that such contracts be forced on industrail labor. In the South, however, the ex-slaves had no choice. There was no other employment available except in farming. They were not qualified to do other kinds of work, even if it had been available. And none of their prospective employers had any cash--the sharecropping contract was the only kind that they could make.

In the south, the theoretically desiable share-tenancy degenerate to an arrangement that was practically indistinguishable from sharecropping. This was brought about because the southern tenants did not possess either the capital or credit which the arrangement presupposes. Even though, technically, he owes the landlord his share for rent, ifthe tenant has had to borrow from the landlord during the year the total value of the remainder of the crop, his actualy position is no better than that of the sharecropper. He ends the year in debt, with nothing to show for his work. The ownership of some simple equipment was not decisive, since it is just as possible to rent land and equipment, as to rent land alone.

In practice, consequently, the two legally opppsite arrangements became totally confused. The tenants were, at the beginning, illiterate. The oral lease or employment contract, or whatever it was,was the only possible arrangement. Only when a dispute arose, which for some reason got into the hands of lawyers, was any attempt ever made to figure out just what kind of a contract had been entered into technically.

The Southern Legislation

When the Southern whites regained control of their state legislatures, a serious effort was made to begin rebuilding the South. In general, however, the problem was regarded as a racial one, rather than an agricultural one. It wasthe xxxx era of the black codes, which, in so far as they had an openly racial basis, were outlawed by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, and of statutes which were to run afoul of the federal peonage laws.

In so far as agriculture was concerned, there were three important type of legislation, which in general remain on the staute books of the Southern states to this day, and, indeed, have been copied in some Northern states.

First, there was the extension of the landlord's lien. At common law, the remedy of the landlord for non-payment of rent was distress--that is, he had the right to go on the property and seize any property that he found there. It was immaterial whether the property was that of the tenant, or of someone else, so long as it was on the property leased. Originally, the landlord's right was of seizure only--to hold the property until the rent was paid. It did not include a right of sale. Later, the right of sale was added. There was, however, no right to follow property, including crops, that had been on the leased premises, and had been removed, before the rent was due or before the landlord exercised his right of distress.

The landlords' lien, operated on a different theory. Under it, the landlord was given a right, universally against the crop, and, in some states against the tenant's personal property also. Under this lien right, if the rent was not paid, the landlord could not only seize the property if he found it still on the leased land, but could also seize it in the hands of purchasers from the tenant, or, if he could not find the property, he could sue the purchaser for its value.

It was the lien theory that the southern legislatures unanimously adopted. The landlord was given a lien for rent which was given priority over all other liens. No one could safely purchase a crop, without assurance from the landlord that the rent had been paid. Thus the landlord, in practice, controlled the market of the crops, even when a technical tenancy had been created and title to the crop was admittedly in the tenant. In case of doubt as to whether a man was a tenant or owner, the purchaser bought at his peril, since leases were neither written nor recorded, and the landlords lien was ~~mmmxth~~ also not written or recorded, since it was given by statute.

At common law, the landlord had no priority for money that he had advanced to his tenant to make the crop or for living expences. Indeed, the common law had not anticipated the furnish system at all. The legislatures, however, extended the lien to furnish money, so that the landlord had a priority over the whole crop. In practice, this meant that no one could safely extend credit to a tenant, even though he held a recorded chattel mortgage, except by agreement of the landlord. There was always the grave risk that the tenant would secure supplies for the landlord also, and, in case the crop did not bring enough to pay everybody, the landlord got paid, and the other creditor was left out.

The landlord's lien actually operated, therefor, to make the landlord the business manager of the farm, no matter what sort of tenancy was created technically. Buyers of crops could safely deal only with him. Merchants and banks had to deal with the landlord, if they were to be assurred of collection. In practice, the landlord borrowed the necessary money, and either re-lent it to his tenants or sharecroppers, or, more often, furnished them in kind, with, of course, a considerable mark-up in the time price, because of the risk of non-payment.

Most southern tenanacy legislation is written on the assumption that the tenant will be a Negro, and pretty incapable of managing business affairs. The legislation is, however, in general terms---there are about as many white sharecropper and tenants in the south as Negro. But the result is the same.

In the case of both groups, and regardless of actualy managerial ability, under the lien statutes, the business man, to protect himself, must deal with the landlord.

The second trend was to bring landlord tenant relationships under the criminal laws. Most important, it was made a criminal offence to sell a crop which was subject to a landlord's lien without paying the rent. Other creditors were protected by making it a criminal offense to sell property subject to a chattel mortgagex, without payment of the mortgage. Further, it was, in many states, made a crime to sell certain crops at night, under any circumstances. Probably these laws were necessary, but despite the formal adherence to common law precedent, it is obvious that a new type of tenancy system was being created if it was felt necessary to enforce to through the threat of criminal punishment.

The notion that it is a crime to dispose of mortgaged property, in fraud on the landlord or other creditor, is today so well accepted in the South, that it xixi comesas a suprise to most Southernersy to learn that a state like Pennsylvania, for example, it had never been felt necessary to enforce either the landlord's right of distress, or chattel mortgages on crops by such criminal statutes. Paradoxically, however, if a Pennsyvanian borrows from a federal relief agency, and gives a chattel mortgages, and thereafter he xxx sells the crop without paying the mortgage, he is guilty of a federal crime. The federal government, even in a relief program, to protect its own loans, follows the Southern precedent.

Another group of statutes is designed to tie the sharecropper or tenant to the land, and is modelled after the medieval stautes of laborers and statutes against enticement of laborers. The most drastic of these, which made it a criminal offense to leave a farm or plantation while indebted to the landlord, are, of course unconstitutional under the Thirteenth Amendment prohibiting involuntary servitute, and in conflict with the Federal peonage laws. The have so been declared by the United States Supreme Court, and are no longer a problem.

Two other types of law survived. It is constitutional to provide, as most southern states do, that if a tenant or sharecropper abandons his crop, he forfeits his interest in the crop to the landlord. Outside the south, the prevailing rule is that in case of abandonment, the landlord has the right to complete making the crop, and can charge the cost to the tenant, but must account to him for any surplus when the crop is sold. The other type of statute prohibits the enticement of laborers or tenants away from their landlords, and is enforced by criminal penalties against either other landlords or labor agents who offer employment to farm laborers already under contract.

Finally, there was an effort at clarification, because of the conflicting results which may result if a tenant is classified as such, or if he is classified as a sharecropper, who is to be regarded as a laborer. Despite the legal anomaly of giving a man a lien against his own property, and the crop is the property of the landlord under a sharecropping contract, the landlords liens were generally extended to cover both types of contract. Practically, it was a good idea, since it kept technicalites out, in case the landlord had to go to court to enforce his right. In Alabama, at a later period, a statute was adopted providing that all farming contract should be regarded as tenancies, and that all sharecroppers should be treated as tenants. This statute, however, was not a reform statute, but an attempt to clarify the situtation, and eliminate technical distictions based upon conflicting interpretations of vague oral contracts.

Similarly, the remedies of the landlord for the evition of tenants and sharecroppers at the end of their term were simplified, and made to apply equally to both classes. The whole aid of these statutes was to make it possible for the landlord to get a man that he no longer wanted off his place, with the mininum of time and expense.

In the legislation, however, there were two types of statutes for the protection of tenants and sharecroppers which were generally adopted. The first, and most effective, was the adoption of a laborers' lien statute. Under this statute, the sharecropper was given a lien corresponding to the landlord's lien, on his share of the crop, and was thus protected against the landlord's general creditors, in case there was any balance due him. A common law substituted for the laborers lien, which was adopted by some of the courts, and made the statute unnecessary, was the theory that in farming on share, either in a sharecrop or a tenancy, that the crop, instead of being owned by one party or the other in its entirety, and rent or wages being owned at the time of division, was in legal theory owned in common by both parties at all times.

If this theory was adopted by the courts, of course, the landlord's lien was also unnecessary, in so far as share rent was concerned. It remained necessary, however, if any of the rent was to be paid in cash, or if a lien for furnish was desired. Consequently, while the states all adopted landlord's lien laws, not all adopted laborer's lien laws, though some which did not achieved the same result by court decision.

Another feature of the legislation in the south, which was favorable to the tenant, was that the landlord's lien laws were directed primarily to the crop. Generally, if the tenant was fortunate enough to have any farming equipment, and did not pay the rent, he did not lose his equipment to the landlord, but only the grop. This was not true of the lien laws in many of the Northern states. However, the omission may be explained, not as favoritism to the tenant, but on the grounds that tenants generally did not have equipment, and did not pay cash rent, so that the landlord was really only interested in a lien against the crop, and that was the only lien which would do him any real good.

Finally, at a later period, there arose legislation in some states deliberately designed to protect the tenant's interests. Notable examples of this type of legislation are the Texas attempts to limit rent to the customary shares, which was held unconstitutional in its original forms, but remains on the books in a modified form, whereby the landlord is deprived of his lien if he charges more than the customary shares of a third and fourth in a tenancy. In North Carolina, in some instances, the advance in price than the landlord can charge when he sells to his tenants and sharecroppers as a time price is limited by statute, and, in other states, some protection had been afforded to tenants, in theory at least, through court decisions holding that the general usury laws are applicable to credit transactions between landlords and tenants. Finally, in Arkansas, as a result of the holding of the court that the sharecropper was legally a laborer, the services of State Department of Labor were made available to sharecroppers who did not received proper payment from their landlords, in the same way that the services of the department were available to city employees who were not paid by their employers. The results, however, were limited, by the fact that few sharecroppers were able to keep the records necessary to prove their cases.

What Kind of a Tenancy System Resulted?

The short answer is that it was the worst the world had ever seen--except in countries where the deliberate exploitation of human being was actually intended.

The main difficulty arose fromthe fact that both the tenancy and the sharecropping agreement were one year affairs. American law have never been intended to provide any system for the widespread operation of tenant farms. As had been pointed out the American tradition was owner operation--true, in the south it was owner operation with slaves, but still continuous owner operation. Tenancies, while legal, were rare, and a short transitional stage to another owner operation.

Actually, the American system of fee simple title in the owner affords the ideal system for operating a farm. The farmer is secure in his possession of the land until his death or retirement. He is encouraged, by his own self interest, to build up the property, and to conserve the soil, since he will remain to reap the benefits of his improvements, or if he chooses to sell, he should get the benefit in an increased price. He can pass on these improvements to his children. The theory of American law is to rely upon this self-interest to automatically protect the public interest in soil conservation, and the public interest in agriculture generally. In general, the system works. There are exceptions, where the farmer through ignorace does not follow his own self interest; where depressions force farmers to exploit the soil to secure cash income; where mortgage debt deprives the owner of the freedom of action which is theoretically his.

The system adopted by the South, however, abandoned this automatic check on the destruction of the soil resources, and destroyed the hope of the people who actually worked on the land. The did not hold their land for life, or until they retired and soldout. They would not receive any benefits of any improvements that they made. They would be fools to attempt to improve the soil or improve the property for the benefit of their landlord or some future tenant.

Universally, and automatically, the leases were made for one year. True, many tenants and sharecroppers, remained for years or for life on one plantation, but each year they acted as if it was their last, which, indeed, it might turn out to be. The result was that all attention was concentrated on the cash crop. Nobody had much interest even in a garden, until the depression and the New Deal crop limitation produced idle land that might just as well be used for that purpose.

Planting of such things as orchards was practically unknown. Why plant fruit trees, when the tenant never knew if he would be there to harvest the fruit. Years later, after he had actually stayed, he might regret not having done so, but he had no incentive to do so at the beginning. Why try to keep up the house, or improve it, why you might be moving out? Why do any extra work for soil conservation, when somebody else might plant the crop on the field next year?

There was no legal reason why this should be so. Long-term leases, subject to the limitation that the must be in writing, were just as legal as short term leases. Indeed, the common law favored the year to year lease, under which the notice to terminate must be given six months in advance, and it is presumed that it will be continued. Generally, however, what was actually used was the worst possible lease for agriculture, a series of definite one year leases. Even with the year to year lease, the legislatures generally cut down the necessary period of notice.

It was perhaps in the destruction of the soil, that the public suffered most from the agricultural system. Although the neglect of soil conservation practices was a national problem, the most dramatic pictures of gullies came from Georgia, and the problem was generally worst in the southern states.

The southern tenancy system began in a poverty caused by war, and it became a self-perpetuating poverty, because it encouraged the destruction of natural resources, and left it human victims without hope for the future. True, there were other factors. The one-crop economy was bad. Cotton prices were too low. Agriculture in general was subject to national economic discriminations. But the tenancy system was also basically at fault. It could not have produced real prosperity under any economic conditions.

The system of liens, coupled with high interest charges, perpetuated a disasterous credit system. Generally the southern tenants and sharecroppers lived perpetually in debt. The liens did protect the holder of the first lien, the landlord, to the extent that he got all the crop, but that did not mean, especially in bad years, that he got all of his bill. Inefficiency, low prices, high interest, and bad years built up accounts against many tenants that they never hoped to pay, and that their landlords never actually hoped to collect.

The rest of the country was going the same way. When the census first began to collect statistics on farm tenancy, the problem was confined to the south. Not enough people were affected by tenancy in the north for it to be a social problem. By 1935, however, the evil had been spread by depression and foreclosure, and states such as Iowa had percentages of tenancy which were as high as those of the southern states. Even there, however, the tenants were in general not dependent on their landlords for both credit and land, but they were alarmed that they might be sinking into the economic and social level of the southern sharecroppers.

The British Experience

About all that America actually borrowed from the British were some common law legal theories, and those borrowing were made at a time when the British themselves were abandoning them for agriculture. As we have seen, America first abandoned them completely, certainly at the time of the Revolution, with the policy determination that farms, in general, should be operated by their owners, and not by tenants at all. The British never took that step, and predominately, farms in England today and always, have been tenant operated. Beginning at least three-quarters of a century ago, the British have been developing a system of tenancy which contemplates a permanent tenant class, operating farms, but which will not bring the agricultural disaster that tenancy has brough to America, especially in the South.

The three basic principles of the British System are Compensation of Improvements, Compensation of Deterioration, and Compensation for Disturbance.

Under Compensation for Improvements, the tenant largely determines what improvements are needed in the farm, makes them with his own funds, and is paid their value in case he leaves the farm. Improvements are divided into three classes, those which the tenant may make without consulting the landlord, those which he may make without the landlord's consent, but of which he must notify the landlord, and finally, major improvements for which he will be compensated only if he secures the landlord's consent. The legislation has been amended many times, most recently in 1948, always to increase the number and kind of improvements which the tenant may make in his own discretion.

Compensation for Deterioration is the landlord's counterO balance for compensation for improvements. Under it, he may recover for deterioriation in the farm caused by the tenant's mismanagement. The landlord's claims under deterioration are set off against the tenant's claims for compensation for improvements, and it may well happen, when all are added up, that a tenant who has not managed the farm properly will owe the landlord. The actual amount of compensation due is determined through arbitration, under the statute.

Compensation for Disturbance recognizes the right of the tenant to permanent occupancy of the farm as long as he desires to remain. Under it, the landlord must pay the tenant damages if he requires him to move without good cause. Damages usually amount to one years rent. Thus all agricultural tenancies are in fact for an indefinite duration, and the tenant isprotected in going ahead with an improvement and conservation program, just as an owner would be, since he will get back what he has put into it, and the expenses of moving, just as an owner would who sold his farm. That, of course, is the purpose of the British program--to place the tenant, for the standpoint of farm operation, is a good a position to operate the farm properly, as an owner would be.

The contrast with the position of the American tenant is rather startling. With regard to improvements--the American tenant is foolish to make them, unless they are physically removable, and then he may be tricked by the law of fixtures and find that they are not legally removable. Besides, they may not be in fact useful on his new place.

The result is that American farms get improved only if the landlord wants to improve them, has the capital to do it, and, can by a cash payment, an extension of the lease, or a threat not to extend, get some coöperation from the tenant. Generally, they just don't get improved.

Conversely, the landlord is pretty helpless where a shiftless tenant lets the place run down. In extreme instances he might have a common law action for waste, which was the the basis for the present English compensation for deterioration. Actually, it doesn't amount to anything, unless the tenant does something cramatically improper, such as cutting all the timber on the place, and selling it.

Compensation of Disturbance is without any American counterpart, except in the case where the landlord cancels a lease without cause in the middle of the term--which is not a frequent occurrence. One feature of the English compensation for disturbance is the arbitration of rentals, which is a kind of rent control. In America, we have gone the other way--while almost all urban property has been under rent control during the war, there has been no suggestion of rural rent control. The only limitation on the landlord's power to increase rents is the force of custom, and perhaps a shortage of good tenants in times of prosperity.

Since the war, the English system has in its essentials been adopted by France, and other European countries have adopted some features of it. Indeed, only in America, does a common law system of tenancy survive in agriculture.

Dear Albert:

Though the Sharecropper Fund has never completed or paid any more on its "grant" to us, we have sufficient funds to finish our obligation to you, from general sources. So here is a check, for $180.00, which completes the agreed sum of $350.00 for your MS.

I am to be Northbound May 18 and 19, and Southbound May 22 and 23. Expect to be in Richmond either on the up or the down trip (New York objective). What would be my chances of getting hold of you, and where and what time of day, on the up and on the down?

I am reviewing Mangum's book, now in print. Tough. Full of your terms, like "attornment" and "privity." Never heard of such things!

Warmly,

Miss Fay Benett — Nat'l. Sharecroppers Fund
40 E. 49th St.
New York, N. Y.

Dear Miss Benett:

You may recall our brief conversation at your office a couple of weeks ago, when you suggested that I send on to you the basic manuscript of a pamphlet in course of porparation by the Southern Regional Council on reform of farm land tenure in the South.

Back in September, 1950, we asked the National Sharecroppers Fund to give us a grant toward production of such a pamphlet. The proposal was pretty fully described in my letter to the Fund dated September 6, 1950. On October 10, 1950, Miss Biderman notified us that the Fund had approved a grant to us for this purpose of $1,500, and in December of that year we received the Fund's check for $400, with a letter saying that for the time being the balance was not in hand, but that the Fund would hope to complete payment of the grant at some date.

We went ahead, found the most recommended man to do the basic writing, and got a manuscript in hand. Author, Albert Cotton, now teaching at the law school at the University of Richmond, and for a number of years employed in the office of the Solicitor of the U. S. Department of Agriculture. He had contributed to the issue of the Duke Law Review on farm land tenure in the South, and had helped in the preparation of the Report of the President's Committee on Farm Tenancy (1935). The manuscript is as yet only a foundation document, and we would shorten it greatly, alter it for use by farm discussion groups, and, I hope, add some stronger recommendations for legislative action. We paid Cotton $350 for the writing, plus minor expenses of travel by him. Our Council has put about $170 of general SRC funds into this project, over and above the $400 received thus far from the National Sharecroppers Fund.

The subject is topical, anyway, in the South, but particularly just now, because of the publication May 25 of the considerable book by Charles Mangum, University of North Carolina Press, called The Legal Status of the Tenant Farmer in the Southeast. We paid Mangum a hundred dollars, incidentally, for advance consultation of his work. The Mangum book should bring the whole subject into discussion, and a pamphlet such as we propose could capitalize on and extend that interest.

What we hope is that the National Sharecroppers Fund will now complete the 1950 grant. If you can't find quite the remaining $1,100, I think we could complete editorial work and print an initial ten thousand copies of the pamphlet for $700.

I would be grateful for your kindness in bringing the matter to the attention of the Fund, and urging a decision. The pamphlet would be widely helpful, and should be put out. Our own members and subscribers in the South supply a circulation of over 4,000 people, many of them in small places and in the open country. And we have sufficient connections with church, civic, and governmental agencies to get such a publication vigorously into the stream of Southern controversy.

What do they say?

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

Your letter with the accompanying manuscript arrived today. It was unfortunate that it had been sent to me addressed in care of New Republic from which it was returned.

Our Board meeting was held on June 18th, and I reported your request to it from the notes I made on your brief visit to our office. Rowland Watts of our Board was the person who had worked with you on your original request to the Fund, and your project was again spoken for by him. Action taken by the Board was to view your request favorably but to defer action until the fall meeting at which time it would be granted priority. Reason for this is that we normally have only enough money during the summer months to carry the office, and must wait until the fall appeal goes out to make grants. I feel sure that if our fall appeal goes well, favorable action should be taken on your request.

Meanwhile, do you want me to keep your manuscript until the fall or should I return it to you? The Board seemed to feel that they knew enough about the projected pamphlet and favored it without needing to actually see it.

Sincerely yours,

Fay Bennett

Dear Mr. Pratt:

At the request of Miss Fay Bennett, executive secretary of the National Sharecroppers Fund, Inc., I send you the manuscript prepared by Mr. Albert Cotton toward a pamphlet on reform of farm land tenure in the South.

It will be recalled that the National Sharecroppers Fund originally voted a grant to the Southern Regional Council of $1,500, to enable the preparation and printing of a pamphlet on this subject. Only $400 of the grant has thus far been paid. The greater part of that went to Mr. Cotton for his work on this manuscript. We are in hopes that the balance of the grant can be sent us at an early date, in order that the publication should see light.

I emphasize that the draft, as presented, is only a draft, and will need a lot of thinning and popularizing. Considerable sections of it we would rewrite entirely. But it is careful work, respectful of the legal history involved.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell
Executive Director

P. S. Albert Cotton was employed for years in the solicitor's office of the Department of Agriculture and is presently a law professor at the University of Richmond.

Dear George:

I have just returned from my trip to Louisiana and expect to see John Connors soon. Glad to know the AFL organizing school went so well. I note you plan to be in Washington for the local Southern Regional Council meeting November 14th. Will you try to arrange some time while your are here to go over a most pressing matter with me.

John Rust the inventor of the cotton picking machine, has set up a foundation for giving away some of the money his machine is now bringing in. He has agreed to underwrite the costs of an agricultural apprenticeship training program to teach workers how to operate the mechanized farm equipment, in use on farms today, including of course his and other cotton pickers. There is a real need for such mechanics and farm machine operators. This appears to be one way that the Union may use in getting agriculture organized. We can place good farm equipment operators whenever we can find them even with some of the most anti-union farm enterprisers.

I have also spoken to Rust about the work of the Southern Regional Council and I am quite sure some of the money he has or will have can be secured for projects you wish to undertake. There are a number of angles on this matter where I think we can work together for the advancement of our programs in the South. Lets talk about it as soon as possible. I doubt if I can get down to Atlanta anytime soon, so let me know when you are to be in the East.

Dear Miss Bennett:

I have been traveling too fast to do an answer to your letter of November 12.

We would send the pamphlet to land grant college people, to some county agents, and generally, I think, to Negro county agents. I willget it also into the hands of people in the Farmers Home Administration. I would want to make a good supply available to H. L. Mitchell to get out to his locals and to his surviving individual members. It would be sent also to Southern law journals for their notice and to the Southern agricultural monthly magazines.

The National Council of Churches of Christ supports a movement favoring the family farm, and we are in touch with them and could get them to use the pamphlet a good deal. They would get it into the hands of rural church people.

I assume the Council would send it out also to our own 4,500 subscribers over the South.

Contributions to the Southern Regional Council are entirely tax-exempt, as established by the treasurer's letter, copy enclosed.

I talked lately in Washington with H. L. Mitchell about the John Rust Foundation. That would be an excellent source of the money if the National Sharecroppers ~~Foundation~~ cannot find the missing $1,100. I hope, indeed, that the John Rust Foundation might step up its total contribution to, say, $2,500.

I still think the pamphlet is a good idea and want to get it out. It will raise discussion of a subject terribly neglected in the South. It would also come out at an appropriate time, because the great, if heavy, volume from Charles Mangum at the University of North Carolina (THE LEGAL STATUS OF THE TENANT FARMER IN THE SOUTHEAST) has been cut only a few months. That's a background for this, which would be an easier discussion of the same topic.

So far I have had a couple of requests for information on how the pamphlet will be promoted--what groups it will go to. Will you please answer this question for us?

If your organization tax exempt; that is, are contributions to your organization deductible for tax purposes?

Someone has suggested that if our Fund doesn't have enough money for the pamphlet, that perhaps the John Rust Foundation would be interested in contributing toward it. What do you think of that? Some of our board members have close connections with Mr. Rust.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

Thank you for your letter of November 24th. Our Board Meeting was not held as scheduled on December 3rd because I was snowed in at my home near Pleasantville that day! Now we are planning the meeting for early January.

However, you should know that the Funds of NSF are quite low right now. Although we are solicited for grants from various organizations whose work lies within our interest, and although we should very much like to make grants to a varied group of organizations, the truth is that in the past few years we have not been able to fully meet our commitment to the Agricultural Workers Union. We need to expand our list of contributors, and make other efforts to bring in more money, and it was to this problem that I hoped to direct the attention of our Board when it met. Now it will have to wait until after the holidays. Even so, it will take time to carry out any plans that might be made.

Although this letter is not written to officially say yea or nay, I want to tell you what our situation is. I would think that an appeal by Eduard Lindeman or Eliot Pratt to the John Rust Fund would be a good thing. We don't get money directly from that Fund because we are not now tax exempt, but since the Southern Regional Council is, that should be in your favor.

Perhaps you would like to think over how the appeal to the John Rust Foundation should be made. If you want it to be a direct appeal from the Council, perhaps you would work out an expanded budget covering not only publication of the pamphlet but promotion of it, etc.

As soon as our Board meets in January, I will let you know what action is taken.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

At last our Board of Directors has met and taken up the subject of the Cotton manuscript on Southern Land Tenure. Several of the Board members read the manuscript carefully and gave a unanimous verdict that it was poorly written and too long for a popular pamphlet. One of the Board members, himself a lawyer, undertook to write a fairly full statement giving suggestions and criticisms of the manuscript, and this statement is copied and enclosed verbatim to give you and Mr. Cotton a detailed account of the criticism instead of generalities.

The Board was definitely interested in the topic of the pamphlet but felt it could make no commitments for the pamphlet in its present form, and agreed that a rewritten, shorter, popular pamphlet should come before it for approval.

Is it possible for Mr. Cotton or someone else to prepare such a revised pamphlet? I know this has been hanging in the air for a long time, and am sorry it must be rejected in its present form. If an effective, popular pamphlet could be prepared, it would get the immediate attention of our Board.

Sincerely yours,

Fay Bennett

Copy of criticism of Cotton manuscript on Southern Land Tenure

"I have read this manuscript with some care. I will merely mention the incredibly poor literary style which would make extensive editing necessary if it were to be used.

"It seems to me that the section entitled, "How to Write a Good Lease" has no place in this study. If, as the author says, present legislation permits the making of practically any kind of arrangement desired, then there is no need for the preceding elaborate study of the present legislation, as an introduction to the section on writing a good lease. Actually, this section could be of considerable value to tenants if published as a short pamphlet in check-list form. This would give them at quick reading, a listing of the points to which they should give attention. The preparation and distribution of such a pamphlet, it seems to me, might be of considerable value. Of course, the author is talking irrationally when he suggests securing a lawyer to draft the lease after all the points involved have been agreed upon. If the parties have overlooked some of the points on the check-list, and the lawyer reminds them of this, then there will be another round of negotiations and discussion. Actually, it would make more sense to have a lawyer in at the negotiations at the outset, if there is to be the use of a lawyer at all. However, my main criticism is that this section, which is probably the more practically valuable section of the manuscript, does not belong with the other sections.

"With reference to the remainder of the manuscript, I confess I am somewhat at a loss to indicate how it should be used. In the light of the relatively simple recommendations for new legislation at the end, buttressed as they are by the author's statement that present legislation permits almost any kind of desired arrangement, there seems to be little use for the preceding elaborate study of existing law. In other words, it seems that the author did not have to go through all the preceding lengthy analyses in order to arrive at his recommendations. I suppose it would be all right to keep both parts of the study, but, in that event, I would suggest that the analysis of existing law should be materially shortened and condensed.

"I don't know of what value the manuscript would be then, even in the suggested form, except as an article for an economics or sociology periodical. Certainly it would not furnish a basis for any popular material, except with respect to the recommendations.

"Finally, I question the value of appendix of the various State laws, as now constituted. As it now reads, it merely lists a few of the special features in each State without giving any general picture of the legal pattern of that State. It may be that this has some value, but I think it would be of much greater value to digest the laws of the various States in the form of a tabular comparison which would break down the legal patterns in each State from the view of perhaps eight or ten major topics relating to agricultural tenancies. In that way, the reader would get a picture at once of the general pattern and of the comparisons between the various States.

"I am sorry to be so critical of a manuscript which is apparently based upon a great deal of study, but I cannot see it as of any great value in its present form."

Dear Fay:

We have had a couple of discussions about your letter of April 16th on the matter of appeals to fetch in money.

We all agree that we ought to work at it by individual solicitation by mail. We will make up a plan and proceed with it.

I do, from time to time, see Aubrey Williams' mailings. They lost their tax-exemption (I think on quite insufficient grounds) and so they are confined to fetching in money by such appeals. We barely make the grade each year using our tax-exemption to the fullest, and we will need the other resources.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

RE: Letter from Fay Bennett

I think we ought to do something by way of direct mail appeals. That means getting up a mailing piece and laying hold of appropriate mailing lists of persons likely to be friendly to us. Father Shean, who knows something about this, is supposed to advise with us on it when he is in Atlanta early in May.

After you have written Miss Bennett, I would like to get this material back for more careful scrutiny.

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

Within the last month I have received two appeals from the Southern Conference Educational Fund, which leads me to believe that this outfit is putting on a strong campaign to enlist support from liberals around the country. What they are doing is exchanging lists with other organizations or periodicals and my name happened to be on two of the lists.

Just in case you do not see their material, I am enclosing a copy of one of these mailings. I am concerned about this drive of the Southern Conference because I am afraid they will get support from a great many well-meaning people around the country who are not familiar with its background and who will probably look upon it as the only voice rising out of the South which talks about justice for the Negro.

Because I know about your widespread program in every Southern state in which you have set up councils of human relations by which Negro and white leaders may work together to solve the race problems in the South, I think it would be an important part of your work to occasionally send out a bulletin to people all over the country telling of your work and also asking for their support. Of course it may be that you do not want any financial support from the north but the Southern Regional Council will certainly need a great deal of help in the way of contributions from Americans of good will from all over the country to sustain its program. I would suggest that now is the time to start ~~looking~~ building up your contributors' list for this purpose and also to counteract the efforts being made by the Southern Conference Educational Fund to try to sell people the idea that they are the lone voice of sanity in the South.

Mrs. Lyells of Miss. Council was most helpful to Al Kramer who recently went to Miss. on behalf of N.S.F. & N.C.

With best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

March , 1956

Dear Friend:

The Southern Conference Educational Fund is administered by Southerners who have faith in democracy. When the United States Supreme Court handed down its decision outlawing segregation in the public schools, the SCEF board of directors applauded the decree because it "reunited" legality and morality in the South.

On February 15th, United States District Judge J. Skelly Wright ordered an end to segregation in the New Orleans schools. He declared that "we are, all of us, freeborn Americans, with a right to make our way, unfettered by sanctions imposed by man because of the work of God." He voiced the creed that inspires all activities of the SCEF.

For ten years the Fund has sponsored an educational program designed to prepare the region for these historical decisions. It has sought to change outworn racial attitudes and to promote new understanding.

This work has now entered a period of crisis. The recent acts of repression and violence in the South indicate the strength of the opposition to it. Yet this work must succeed if America is to remain true to its ideals of liberty and brotherhood.

We are asking your help. All of the money for the Fund comes from contributions by individuals who recognize the importance of having a forthright spokesman for democracy in the South. We hope the enclosed summary of the SCEF's past projects will lead you to give generous support.

Sincerely,

Aubrey Williams

The SCEF: 1946-56 -A Brief History, A Proud Record

"The past is prologue," according to a half-million after-dinner speakers, at least. And there is truth in the old Shakespearean saw. But there is also a quality to the past that makes it not only a guide to future action but a drama, complete, stirring and valuable of itself.

In essaying a summary of SCEF projects over the past ten years no chronicle of less than volume size could come close to capturing the spirit, the heroism, the self-sacrifice of the individuals who participated. We hope that those who read and remember the parts they played will know that they have not been forgotten. We hope that those to whom this record is new will recall the regional situation in the years in which the events occurred.

The SCEF underwrote a test case challenging the constitutionality of the Georgia county-unit voting system. Two pamphlets — "Would You Smile?" and "Look Him in the Eye"—presented statistical studies of Negro living conditions. Each booklet had a distribution of 50,000 copies.

A fight between a Negro and a white man in Columbia, Tenn., led to the terrorization of the Negro community first by an armed mob and then by state troopers. A hundred Negroes were arrested, many were beaten by police, and two were killed in jail. The SCEF printed and circulated 100,000 copies of a pamphlet giving the facts and protesting against the atrocity.

TEN YEARS OF BATTLE FOR A SIMPLE TRUTH

This month marks the tenth anniversary of the Southern Conference Educational Fund. To look back is to feel venerable, so great have been the changes in the region since January 26, 1946. Yet again, so rich in promise has been the past decade, that to look forward is to enjoy in anticipation the years to come. And the SCEF has always looked forward.

If one is to appraise the history of the SCEF to date for some capsule meaning, perhaps one could say that the organization in its life span has demonstrated the virtues and the handicaps of being simple-minded.

Yes, simple-minded—in the sense that the SCEF, its officials, and its supporters believed the simple truth that racial segregation was morally wrong and should be abolished.

They held segregation to be evil because its fruits were fear and hate, rather than respect and love.

They were Southerners but they couldn't see how that exempted them from being Americans. And they didn't believe that laws creating second-class citizenship could be squared with American ideals of democracy and brotherhood.

This simple idea forms the core that has held the SCEF together these past years. It has been the basic message of every gathering, every piece of literature, every petition, every project of any sort the organization has sponsored. And even though—until the Supreme Court met the segregation issue squarely in 1954—the SCEF's program was "against the law" in the South, the simple truth found it many allies and friends.

Because of this support, and because the simplicity of the SCEF's attitude showed that it meant what it said, the Fund has received the full impact of professional bigots' wrath. But the SCEF has survived, survived without taking a backward step.

Looking back at the record, it is amusing—and perhaps instructive—to note that the Southern Patriot of January, 1946, carries a letter to SCEF Director, Dr. James A. Dombrowski, which states:

Dear Dombrowski:

I have just received through a friend of mine in Jackson, Mississippi, two sheets that your un-American, negro social equality, communistic, mongrel outfit is sending out throughout the country in your mad desire to build up a factual case against the right and prerogative of a United States Senator or Senators to filibuster any objectionable legislation that is proposed in this great body. . . .

The letter was signed: Theodore G. Bilbo, United States Senate.

And so one sees that with the white supremacists, nothing has changed. Yesterday Bilbo, today Eastland—but the prime target remains the SCEF.

Former heavyweight champion Gene Tunney was once asked what was the key to success in boxing. He replied: "Always fight another round." This, the SCEF has done for a decade; this, the SCEF pledges to do in the future—simply and directly, in the cause of plain truth and common decency.

POLL OF SOUTHERN EDUCATORS FORECASTED EASE OF COLLEGE INTEGRATION

A "Declaration of Universal Franchise" was signed by more than a hundred educators, union leaders, ministers and journalists. The document, widely distributed, challenged the schemes of various legislatures in the effort to circumvent Supreme Court decisions re: "white primaries." Later the federal rulings upheld the views expressed in the declaration.

On March 22, 350 Floridians attended a statewide conference at Winter Park to protest the Matthews "white primary" bill. Rev. D. C. Whitsett was chairman; Harry T. Moore, was a speaker; the SCEF Executive Director served as coordinator.

In October, the SCEF distributed 125,000 copies of "Separate and Unequal," a study with graphs and pictures of the effect of segregation in education. Said one passage: "A community that gives lip service to the ideals of equality, freedom and universal brotherhood, yet condones a set of human relationships that daily deny these ideals cannot possibly enjoy a healthy and stable mental life. A community, like an individual, cannot live with a big lie without serious psychological results and inevitable spiritual decay." Seven years later this concept, too, became part of the law of the land.

"The Color Line in Health," gave a full documentation of how segregation literally cost lives by limiting access to medical care and creating unsanitary community conditions.

Three defendants, including the director of the SCEF, won acquittal on charges of violating the segregation ordinance in Birmingham, Ala. The case arose out of a meeting of the Southern Negro Youth Congress where Senator Glen Taylor was scheduled to speak. Birmingham police chief "Bull" Conner had harassed the program from the outset; the Dixiecrat revolt was brewing and five Negroes had been killed by city police within a month. Taylor, too, was arrested and received a going-over from police. The acquittals came because the city judge feared that the defendants were ready to make a federal test case of the matter. Ironically, Taylor was convicted and was unable to win a reversal upon appeal.

At a time when the Southern Governors Conference was promoting the idea of regional graduate schools as a means of staving off the demand of Negroes for entry into state professional and graduate institutions, the SCEF took a series of polls of Southern faculties on the matter.

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Madame Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit, and Mrs. Mary McLeod Bethune at the SCEF reception in their honor.

A poll of the state university faculties in eleven Southern states revealed that in seven of them a majority supported graduate school integration; the University of Alabama yielded a tie vote; Georgia, Mississippi and South Carolina voted for the regional plan.

On Nov. 20, a group of 50 Southerners met in conference at the University of Virginia. In a pilgrimage to Monticello, the home of Thomas Jefferson, they formaly adopted a "Declaration of Civil Rights" that had previously been endorsed by 200 outstanding persons in the region. The declaration said, in part, "We still believe that all men are created equal and are endowed as men with certain rights . . . We take these rights to include equality before the law, and freedom from any discrimination bolstered by law; a right to vote; freedom of expression; an unrestricted access to all institutions supported by taxes for the public welfare, schools and hospitals not excluded; equal pay for equal work, and equal opportunity to receive training and to gain employment; and the right to unsegregated transportation, housing and assembly."

A poll of 15,000 teachers in 155 Southern colleges and universities in which 3,422 replied revealed that seven out of ten favored integration in graduate and professional schools.

The SCEF served as coordinator for an amicus curiae brief in the Sweatt case, which resulted in the ending of segregation in the law school of the University of Texas. It was signed by 18 lawyers from 13 Southern States. One of the salient points argued was:

"The lawyer who has been educated in a segregated law school must inevitably find the attitudes ingrained in him by the segregation carried over into his practice, with consequent embarrassment, failure to adequately represent the interests of his client, tension between lawyer and client and other more subtle pitfalls. Only attendance at an unsegregated law school can give a white law student in the South the background of dealing on a man-to-man basis with Negro clients and Negro lawyers in his practice."

Meeting at Atlanta University on April 8 some 250 professors and students attended the SCEF-coordinated Conference on Discrimination in Higher Education. They called for an end to segregation statutes, but also expressed the hope that "the educational institutions themselves, many of which were founded upon religious faith and high moral principles, will take the lead in bringing about fair play and a truly democratic culture."

Albert Einstein sent a message to the gathering which stated:

"If an individual commits an injustice he is harassed by his conscience. But nobody is apt to feel responsible for misdeeds of a community, in particular, if they are supported by old traditions. Such is the case with discrimination. Every right-minded person will be grateful to you for having united to fight this evil that so greviously injures the dignity and repute of our country. Only by spreading education among all of our people can we approach the ideals of democracy.

"Your fight is not easy, but in the end, you will succeed."

In December, the SCEF addressed an appeal to Governor John S. Battle of Virginia, asking clemency for the "Martinsville Seven," the seven Negro youths who were subsequently executed for raping a white woman. It was pointed out that in 13 Southern states during the period 1938-48, sixty-eight per cent of those executed for murder were Negro; 92 per cent of those executed for rape were Negro. Yet, according to 1940 census figures, Negroes made up only 23.8 per cent of the population in those states. On that basis it was urged that "judicial bias and undue severity toward the Negro defendant might reasonably be deduced."

Braving the coldest weather ever recorded in South Carolina, 125 Southerners made a pilgrimage to the Charleston home of federal judge J. Waties Waring. Waring's firm action had ended the white primary in South Carolina. He and his wife also spoke out against discrimination, despite tremendous pressure.

SCEF President Aubrey Williams presented the jurist with a citation which said: "It has been seen that many another, in your place, has found it possible, before obdurate prejudices and customs, to avoid the guidance of the noblest guarantees of our Constitution. Your own faithfulness in this field, despite environmental discouragement others have bowed to, has been exemplary and heartwarming."

A reception by the SCEF honored Madame Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit, Ambassador of India, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, and Mrs. Mary McLeod Bethune.

The celebrated photo study "Children in America" by Marion Palfi was booked for a year-long tour of libraries, schools and art galleries in the South.

After the brutal Christmas bombslaying of a NAACP leader Harry T. Moore in Florida, a group of fifty outstanding Floridians demanded that Governor Fuller Warren convene a conference to study and improve human relations in the State. The SCEF served as secretariat for the group.

A girl student, Miss Odilla Jacques, at Our Lady of the Lake College in San Antonio won the $100 first prize offered by the SCEF for the best editorial on segregation to appear in a student newspaper.

Of 2,414 administrators polled, 711 replied. Favoring segregation of Negro patients were 479; integration was backed by 127. Seventy-six suggested the erection of separate hospitals for Negroes. The rest either did not answer the question or gave other answers.

In a poll of all the 42,500 white doctors in 17 Southern states, 5,750 replies were received. Of these, 64 per cent backed segregation of patients; 17 per cent integration; 11 per cent the erection of separate hospitals for the races. However, 71 per cent approved admission of Negroes to medical societies. Sixty-three per cent gave outright sanction to admission of Negro doctors to hospital staffs, and 14 per cent voted a qualified approval.

"The Untouchables," a 36-page multicolor pamphlet designed and illustrated by the famous American artist Ben Shahn, presented the SCEF case studies of hospital discrimination and exclusion. The booklet was written by the Southern journalist Alfred Maund and 25,000 copies were distributed. Mrs. F. D. Roosevelt devoted her column "My Day" for Oct. 17 to a discussion of the work, declaring: "It is such organizations as the SCEF that will really bring about the changes all of us hope for—not only in the South but throughout the country."

SCEF President Aubrey Willams appeared before the platform committee of the Democratic Party to urge adoption of an uncompromising civil-rights plank. The SCEF was the only Southern organization to take this stand.

President J. W. Marshall of Wayland Baptist College, Plainview, Texas, was the keynote speaker at a youth conference held during the Christmas holidays in Columbia, S. C. The event, coordinated by the SCEF and sponsored by some 400 persons throughout the South, under the chairmanship of Dr. H. D. Bollinger, of Nashville, Tennessee, drew 141 delegates from 48 colleges. The interracial assembly was housed at Allen University, in the shadow of Governor Byrnes' mansion. It received prominent and impartial press coverage. The assembly urged the governors of the Southern states to "act immediately to eliminate segregation in education." The Nation magazine reported the event under the heading, "The Future Comes to the South."

On Oct. 12 SCEF President Aubrey Williams and Governor Herman Talmadge of Georgia debated the issue of segregation in the public schools over the DuMont Television Network. Kineoscope recordings of the program were distributed to discussion groups over the South.

A medical advisory committee of Southern physicians was formed to aid the SCEF attack on discrimination in medical and health facilities.

Said the Southern Patriot in January: "Never has the Child been a more appropriate symbol of the New Year. For 1954 is destined to be known as the Year of the Child . . . If the (Supreme Court) outlaws segregation in education —as we think it must—the harsh graven face of the traditional South presents to the world will twitch in dismay. But in the fulness of time today's smiling child will take up the regional standard, still smiling—smiling with love for others with the radiance an easy conscience brings."

John Bolt Culbertson, an attorney in Greenville, S. C., vice-president of the SCEF, testified in behalf of a federal FEPC act. He told a Senate Labor subcommittee in Washington:

"The Old Order buttressed itself in the South by means of all-inclusive segregation statutes. Fortunately, these statues are wilting before the scrutiny of the courts. But unfortunately, no clear assertion of public policy has replaced them, and there is some uncertainty and lack of direction. A Federal Equality of Opportunity in Employment law would formulate explicitly the course our democracy is taking and would bolster those millions of people who want to make democracy a way of life."

On March 18-20 Senator Eastland brought a retinue of professional informers to New Orleans in the attempt to smear the SCEF as a Communist-front. SCEF officials denied Communist ties, past and present, and Eastland admitted failure to a representative of the Montgomery Advertiser. The clear racist intention of the investigation and the star-chamber conduct of the hearings drew protest from Negro leaders and from the regional and national press. The SCEF emerged with new support and with an enlarged board of directors.

On April 22, the school of journalism of Lincoln University, Jefferson City, Mo., presented the Southern Patriot one of its annual awards for "significant contributions to better human relations." The Patriot, said the judging committee, "has been a monthly fearless spokesman for the rights of minorities in a territory where such voices are comparatively silent."

Of the Supreme Court decision outlawing public-school segregation the Patriot said: "With the death of the 'separate but equal' dogma, ethics and legality have been reunited in the South for the first time in more than a half century. All the peoples of the South, and the nation, can now appraise themselves and their society by a single standard." But, being quick to note the significance of the "Braden Case" that was arising in Louisville, Ky. (at the time the house had not yet been bombed, nor had the whites who helped the Negro purchase it been indicted for "sedition"), the Patriot added: "School districts are geographical, the choice of schools is based on proximity—and Negro ghettos will produce ghetto schools, 'integrated' in name only . . . It is true that the Supreme Court has ruled that restrictive housing covenants are unenforceable. But real estate groups who profit off racial phobias are unremitting and unscrupulous in their extra-legal efforts to maintain the barriers."

Although Mississippi approved a constitutional amendment empowering the legislature to abolish the public schools and replace them with state-subsidized "private" schools, a poll of white teachers in the state revealed nearly two-to-one opposition to the segregation-saving gimmick. The 2,886 ballots received represented approximately one-third of the state's teachers.

Six hundred and twenty-seven also declared they would have no objection to teaching in an integrated school system.

Regional meetings on compliance with the Supreme Court decision on segregation in public schools were held in Richmond, Va., and Houston, Tex., in the months of January and May. Speakers included educators from neighboring areas where integration had been effected. The sessions were also designed to muster interest in the South-wide conference scheduled for 1956. Chairman of the group of 600 sponsors of the proposed conference is Bishop S. L. Greene, senior bishop of the AME Church of Atlanta, Ga.

On Sept. 12, a petition signed by 200 citizens of New Orleans requested the city's school board to lay immediate plans for ending segregation. The signers included persons distinguished in New Orleans and nationally for social, civic and professional achievement. They represented the largest inter-racial group yet to file such a plea in a Southern city.

Rabbi Julian B. Feibelman, who led the committee presenting the petition, said in his accompanying remarks: "We are chagrined to call attention to the fact that children applying for admission into our schools in New Orleans today must present a notarized statement that they are white. This would hardly appear, in the light of the proud history of public education . . . to be consistent with a democratic spirit or even of a humane policy."

Later, on Dec. 15, a prominent group of 100 sponsors held a forum on school integration to commemorate Human Rights Week. The Rev. Allen Hackett, pastor of the interracial Pilgrim Congregational Church in St. Louis, was the principal speaker. Because the Executive Director of the SCEF was serving as coordinator for the meeting, the Young Men's Business Club seized upon the Eastland report to attempt a "boycott" of the forum. The school board, which had granted permission to use a school auditorium, rescinded the grant, then yielded when the sponsors refused to panic and persevered. The forum marked the first sympathetic public discussion of the issue.

RECEIVED JUN 15 1956

Dear Friend,

I wish you could see some of the letters coming to the office of the National Sharecroppers Fund these days. You would share the deep satisfaction of being able to help some families in the deep South against economic reprisals in these times of inter-racial tension.

We receive urgent letters asking for help because a home is to be foreclosed, a farm tractor repossessed or house furnishings seized. Their requests are not for gifts or charity but for loans to replace the local credit which is no longer available to those who speak up for their civil liberties and lawful rights.

These requests for help have been added to our regular program on behalf of migrant and other low-income farm families.

We now turn to you for help. Your gift will be multiplied in its use. It will not only help a deserving Negro family in the deep South now, but later when the loans are repaid the funds will be used again for long-range programs. Since our resources are running low we hope that you can respond at an early date.

Again, our deep appreciation for your support.

Sincerely yours,

Frank P. Graham

SPECIAL REPORT ON MISSISSIPPI EMERGENCY

By Fay Bennett, Executive Secretary
National Sharecroppers Fund, Inc.

June, 1956

In a recent request for aid, a key Negro leader writes:

> "I am still here in Mississippi and don't plan to leave soon. But I need some operating cash to keep my farm going until the crops are in and the Citizens Council people here have seen to it that I can't get any loan. Still I am very happy as long as we have people like you folks to help keep us alive, and we shall hold the fort. We shall look forward with happiness to a brighter tomorrow."

National Sharecroppers Fund is arranging the loan he needs.

Because the increasing tensions in Mississippi have brought rapidly mounting requests for financial help to NSF, the Board of Directors sent a special investigator to talk with persons whose livelihoods are being threatened. Here is part of his report:

> "Two major problems are basic and need immediate attention of a sustained nature. These are the need to gain the vote and the need to develop a sound credit system. Voting by Negroes is practically nonexistent. This judgment is based, not on the fact that by far the majority of Negroes don't seek to exercise the vote, but on the fact that when he does seek to vote, every possible effort is made in the counties visited to prevent his use of the ballot box.
> "The second major need is a sound credit system with reasonable interest, free from being used as an economic weapon to curtail such basic rights as the right to earn a living, to vote, etc. A fundamental aspect of such a system would be some form of cooperative self-help endeavor. There is a real need for a program to develop land ownership among tenant and sharecropper families. Already forty land-owning Negro farmers have formed an association whereby they hope to develop cooperative plans to help make secure their own farming operations, and to aid their less fortunate landless brothers to acquire land."

Voting rights must be left to other organizations but the economic needs of the tenant farmer have always been a primary concern of National Sharecroppers Fund. We have reached in several directions to provide moral support and guidance as well as sources of funds to this group of forty farmers which has courageously set its sights on the future. Other long-range efforts at cooperation are being supported.

Most urgently, we have moved rapidly to give immediate aid in cases where economic need was caused by the struggle of the Negroes to achieve their rights. Cash loans have been made after a quick but thorough investigation of each case. The following are typical examples:

Mr. H. His $1800 farm tractor (almost wholly paid off) being repossessed. A tenant farmer, Mr. H. was ordered off the land and lost his credit standing because of his organizational associations. NFS provided a loan and saved the tractor which means his livelihood.

Mr. B. A tenant farmer for 20 years. Active locally in organization for the rights of Negroes. Credit cut off. No crop loan available. Lost his pick-up truck by repossession several months ago. His combine and home furnishings were about to be seized when NSF came through with a loan.

Mr. T. Tenant farmer. A qualified voter for some years. Last fall his ballot was snatched from him and put in an envelope beside the ballot box. When Mr. T. challenged this procedure, his credit standing suddently evaporated; he could get no crop loan; his outstanding debts on farm equipment were called. Our investigator reported: "In desperation he turned to local 'loan sharks' and after giving a second mortgage on everything from the bed he sleeps on to the tractor he farms with, he was able to get $300 each from two loan companies to carry on his farming operation. With this $600, Mr. T. had to buy food for his family of eight, buy seed, fertilizer, and gasoline for his tractor. By June, his funds were used up." His debts to the loan companies, plus 33 1/3 % interest, couldn't be repaid. His equipment was about to be repossessed when an NSF loan was made.

All loans made by National Sharecroppers Fund are non-interest bearing, long-term loans to help the farmer facing economic reprisal put himself and his family on their feet.

Battleaxe & Bread

By Lester B. Granger

Recently I got a report from the National Sharecropper's Fund, which is a too-little-known organization that seeks to keep national attention focused on the condition of the low man on the totem pole in agriculture. The report makes shocking reading, not because it presents startling new facts, but because the story that it tells follows so closely the old familiar pattern.

Granger

It is a bitter comment on the short memory of the general public that almost no one except a few people gives any sustained thought to the plight of sharecroppers—that is, except the sharecroppers themselves.

Twenty years ago, when John Steinbeck's "Grapes of Wrath" was a best-seller and, later, a powerful film, the word "sharecropper" was synonymous with hunger, illiteracy and desperation.

Double Tragedy

Today most people think that sharecropping is a thing of the past, like peonage—and that's a double tragedy. It's a tragedy because the sharecropper is still very much with us; it's a tragedy that people should become so used to continued suffering as to be able to forget it and pretend that it doesn't exist any longer.

Fay Bennett, executive secretary of the National Sharecroppers Fund, reports a typical tenant-farmer condition in Alabama, not far from Tuskegee Institute. "Rent was paid in bales of cotton. Twenty percent of the families owned no livestock, and more than half of the renters did not own a cow or a hog. Eighty-seven percent of the families owned some poultry, with an average of approximately 13 birds. Forty-five percent of the farmers owned no farm equipment. Many farmers were reluctant to disclose the unfavorable condition of their financial status. The vicious cycle of being 'furnished' through the year by the landlord, paying high interest rates on loans, and ending the season by just breaking even, or in the hole, has sapped much of the life out of many good farmers."

Rotting To Pieces

It is true that in this particular case a Farmers Club, organized several years ago, has improved the situation by pooling savings in a credit union, making cooperative purchases of seed and fertilizer, buying a tractor used cooperatively, and expanding kitchen garden and home canning activities.

It is also true, however, that there are hundreds of thousands of tenant-farmers and sharecroppers still lacking leadership of this kind. They are rotting to pieces just as steadily and surely as a valuable piece of farm machinery would rot into worthlessness if left neglected and exposed to the elements year after year.

Move Away

Tens of thousands of sharecroppers are protesting these conditions by moving off the farm. They have escaped from living conditions in which they had incomes of less than $1,000 for feeding, clothing and caring for an entire family.

They have watched the federal government move in with farm improvement programs for the South, programs which, for the most part, have benefited the farm owners – the plantation bosses – rather than the chap underneath who has needed the help most. The percentage of tenant-farmers and sharecroppers has been declining steadily during the past 20 years, but not rapidly enough. And declining in the wrong way for a family that has lived on the farm for generations and loves farm life should not have to pull up stakes and move to a city slum in order to improve itself.

Aid For Others

There should be a way for bringing technical and financial assistance to our depressed farm classes, just as we have brought this aid to peoples in other lands, in such a way as to stabilize their situation and build insecurity into security from year to year.

Isn't it queer that a country which has been able in the past ten years to work out daring and imaginative programs for aid to under-developed countries can't find a way to give substantial and lasting aid to under-developed groups within our own population?

This is the picture of conditions which too many Americans have forgotten since the ugly black days of the Great Depression. It is a picture that the National Sharecroppers Fund is trying valiantly to keep before the public and will continue to try as the problem of tenant-farming and sharecropping continues.

Those who would like to know more about the Fund itself and the cause that it serves can write to the National Sharecroppers Fund at 112 East 19th Street, New York City.

Dear Friend,

I think you will be interested in the enclosed annual report of the National Sharecroppers Fund on "The Condition of Farm Workers in 1957." It contains a good many facts on a very serious problem which becomes even more compelling with rising unemployment.

Several contradictions in our government's farm programs come to light in the report. One is the continued and accelerated program for importing foreign nationals to work on the large farms while American farm workers are unemployed. Another is the huge sums given to large farm operators while the small farmer gets inadequate consideration.

We hope you will find the report useful.

Sincerely yours,

THE CONDITION OF FARM WORKERS IN 1957

REPORT TO THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND, INC.
By Fay Bennett, Executive Secretary

The year 1957 ended with great suffering for thousands of migrant and sharecropper families in different parts of the United States. Crop freezes in Florida brought reports like this:

> "...Whole families are forced to live in the open...Many are making homes in cardboard and any other kind of makeshift shacks in the woods..."
> --Miami Daily News (February 22, 1958)

Floods followed by a cold wave brought this to Tennessee:

> "...Literally thousands of farm families in the 'Mississippi bottoms' area actually are hungry and facing starvation unless help comes quickly..." --Atlanta Journal-Constitution (January 12, 1958)

No weather problems but just the ordinary situation for migrants in California is told here:

> "...Longest slum in the world...village conditions in Pakistan no worse than some of the California camps...migratory families living under conditions similar to refugees in Seoul (Korea)..."
> --San Jose Mercury (January 23, 1958)

A freeze or flood serves to underscore the fact that most farm worker families are so low on the economic scale that few have reserves to meet emergencies.

THE AMERICAN FARM

The estimated farm population in April, 1957, was 20,396,000 persons, a drop of over 1 million in a year and a decrease of 4,662,000 since 1950. A clearer picture can be obtained from a division of farms according to the dollar value of their output.

Of the almost 5 million farms in the U. S. according to the 1954 census, 3% -- 134,000 -- produce 31.3% of the output and utilize 22.4% of the farm acreage. It is estimated that these 134,000 farms employ more than 20% of the approximately 2 million domestic farm workers and the great bulk of the 466,000 imported contract workers. These are the farms whose output adds up to the surpluses the federal subsidy program is supposed to curtail. The surplus is not increased significantly by the 1 million small farmers -- more than 1/3 of all commercial farms -- whose gross income is less than $2,500. Yet government programs, working against themselves, continue to favor the 134,000.

FAMILY FARMS FACE CRISIS

As thoughtful people become increasingly concerned with the equation of bigness in industrial life with the growth toward conformity, attention may well be focused upon the American family farmer who through the decades has represented freedom. Owning his own land and self-employed, the farmer has been free to speak as he believed. But, in order to make use of mechanization and improved farming methods, a successful farm must have sufficient acreage and capital. The availability of credit at reasonable interest rates and other government policies play a vital role in determining whether the family farmer will stay in business or be displaced by the giant corporation farms. Here is how the pattern of government policies emerges:

> Total federal farm expenditures for all farm programs including subsidy payments were about 5 billion dollars last year. About 2 billion dollars were spent directly for stabilizing farm prices. Over 500 million dollars went in direct cash payments under the soil bank program, paid largely to corporation farms. Over 1/4 million dollars ($278,187.38) was paid to just one farmer under the latter program.
> These sums contrast sharply with the $342.5 million spent by the Farmers Home Administration in its loan program for the year on behalf of small farmers who have no other source of credit. Making loans to approximately 118,000 farmers, the average loan to each was less than $2,000.

Other government policies favoring the big farm include the farm labor import program which brings nearly 1/2 million under-paid foreign workers into the country and no minimum wage and maximum hour legislation for American farm workers. The so-called efficiency of the corporate farms would seem to stem in large part from the subsidies they receive directly in government cash payments and indirectly in the exploitation of farm labor. This program of subsidizing bigness throws more and more small farmers off their land into the city slums or into the migrant stream. Is this good for America?

THE MIGRANT WORKER

Here is a sample of his life as one of the 1/2 million to 1 million* migrant farm workers in this country:

> Men, women and children loaded onto trucks in early evening. First stop made at 11 P.M. for a meal. Told by diner's proprietor to move on. Next stop at 1 A.M. for gas. Migrants not allowed to use toilets. An hour later stop made in a woods for "bathroom" purposes. Continued riding all night. Stopped at 6 A.M. for purchase of cold cuts, bread and soda pop at country store. At noon stopped for drinking water at a spring. State troopers followed trucks rest of day and no stops permitted. At 8 P.M. stop made at a country store to purchase more cold cuts, bread and soda pop. State troopers prevented migrants from leaving truck. Stopped at 3 A.M. for 1-1/2 hours for sleep. At 11 A.M. of second day, migrants arrived at the camp where they hoped to work. (Adapted from a Florida State Board of Health report.)

What does the migrant find at "camp?" Sun-up to sun-down picking if the weather is good. Days of being cooped up in crowded shacks if rain sets in.

In most cases, housing for migrants is wretched. Even in Northern states it sometimes consists of abandoned barns, chicken coops and delapidated shacks. Men, women and children are often herded into one room. Medical attention for migrants is sporadic at best. Cases of infant diarrhea as well as disabling illness of adults have many times gone untreated. Schooling in the past usually has consisted of a few years in elementary school, and this in inferior segregated southern schools which until recently only held "short sessions" so children could work in the fields. Education now must be of prime concern if we are to seek a better life for the children than their parents have.

MIGRANT AID

On the national level the President's Committee on Migratory Labor acts for government. With the barest budget ($56,000 annually), it works with states and federal departments concerned with migrants. It has produced some good recommendations in the fields of housing and transportation and is now working on recommendations for insurance coverage and registration of crewleaders.

The Interstate Commerce Commission adopted regulations on June 17th governing the transportation of migrants for interstate travel. The regulations became effective August 1st, with the provision that the requirements as to seats and seating space in trucks would be observed on and after November 1st. During this interval, several serious accidents occurred involving migrants riding in trucks, including the overturning and burning of a flat-bed truck in North Carolina in June killing 17 men, women and children and injuring 26 more. Even now the new federal law covers only those migrants traveling more than 75 miles, and crossing state boundaries. Only a few states have laws covering migrant transportation within a state.

A non-governmental agency which performs admirable service in this field on a low budget is NATIONAL COUNCIL ON AGRICULTURAL LIFE AND LABOR, a clearing house with which the Fund and 35 other citizen organizations work for improvements for farm workers and the small family farmer. NSF contributes to its support. Its excellent informative Bulletin is sent regularly to affiliated groups and individual subscribers.

ORGANIZED LABOR AND NATION'S FARM WORKERS

With a special grant from the Industrial Union Department of AFL-CIO, the National Agricultural Workers Union increased its efforts to organize workers on the large western farms. Under the dynamic leadership of Ernesto Galarza, it uncovered many areas where Mexican nationals were used in defiance of the law while domestic workers were unemployed. It documented repeated charges of hunger and homelessness, citing whole families sleeping on river banks and under bridges. Galarza's evidence was presented to the California governor with the result that more jobs were opened up to the local workers and the Farm Placement Service curtailed use of Mexican nationals in certain areas.

Another accomplishment of the union's persistence was opening of the records of the State Department of Employment to public inspection to determine how many foreign nationals were being employed in a given area. This is an important step in breaking down the screen of secrecy behind which the foreign labor program has operated in some states.

The National Agricultural Workers Union (formerly Southern Tenant Farmers Union) continued its work with the group of small farmers in Louisiana who had formed a cooperative association to market their strawberry and vegetable crops. With its devoted president, H. L. Mitchell (the son of an Arkansas tenant farmer) often on the local scene, nearly 1,000 new members joined the union in the state. Union contracts were negotiated with employers of 600 sugar cane workers in Louisiana providing wage increases of 12¢ to 17¢ an hour and other benefits. Union efforts are slowly improving wages and conditions which even now are barely adequate for subsistence although the large growers in Louisiana receive some of the largest subsidy benefits handed out by government.

At a luncheon honoring Dr. Frank P. Graham, held in Atlantic City during the AFL-CIO convention, many labor leaders praised Dr. Graham for his long service to the nation's underprivileged, lauded his leadership of National Sharecroppers Fund, and called for a real effort on the part of organized labor to raise the living standards of farm workers. A. Philip Randolph used the occasion to announce that AFL-CIO President George Meany had authorized a survey preliminary to the development of an organizing campaign among the nation's 2 million unorganized farm workers. Later, it was reported that this survey is to be made through the facilities of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Department of which Walter P. Reuther is president. At this writing, the AFL-CIO survey has not yet been launched but NSF is hopeful that 1958 will see the opening of a full-scale farm workers organization campaign backed by the labor movement.

CONTRACT LABOR

The program for importing nationals from other countries under temporary contract to work on American farms has accelerated. The Immigration Service provides the following figures for the fiscal year ending June 30 1957:

Total imported contract laborers	466,713
Contract laborers imported from Mexico*	450,422
" " " " Canada	7,015
" " " " British West Indies	8,244
" " " " Japan	1,000
" " " " French West Indies	32

In addition to these, the Department of Labor lists 3,912 temporary farm workers coming to this country during 1957 from the Bahamas. From Puerto Rico, 13,214 seasonal farm workers came under contract and an estimated 10,000 additional Puerto Rican migrants came on their own. (Since Puerto Ricans are U.S. citizens, they are free to move back and forth between the islands and the mainland.)

*The Immigration Service reports an additional 44,451 Mexican workers illegally in the U.S. who were apprehended during the year.

Peak number of all Americans engaged in agriculture in 1957 were 10,077,000 according to the Department of Agriculture. About 2 million are farm laborers. Despite the fact that chronic unemployment* exists for American farm workers a good part of the year, caused by intense specialization and factory farming, 25% more than the available supply of American farm labor is imported.

MOUNTING CONCERN EXPRESSED FOR CONTRACT LABOR ABUSES

Following the publication of "Strangers in Our Fields," based on an extensive field study by Ernesto Galarza documenting the shocking disregard of the rights of the Mexican nationals, the Department of Labor issued new housing regulations. When enforcement officers attempted to put the regulations into practice, the growers fought against this attempt to enforce the law. A result of the growers' campaign has been a smaller appropriation in the coming year's federal budget for enforcing compliance of the Mexican workers' agreement.

The widespread violations of the Mexican nationals' contracts, and the exploitation of American farm workers who work without benefit of contract or protective legislation, is in strong contrast to the benefits accorded Puerto Rican and British West Indian seasonal workers in this country. To the credit of their representatives, offices are maintained in this country and careful supervision is given to the work contracts which include guaranteed hours of work, minimum or prevailing wages (whichever are higher), and group insurance providing hospitalization, surgical benefits, out-patient benefits, doctors' calls, weekly income for workers unable to work because of accident or illness, and death benefits. Decent housing, transportation, and meals are also carefully stipulated and enforced. No such contract benefits accrue to American migrants.

DEEP SOUTH DEVELOPMENTS

Sharecropping, segregation, one-party politics -- this is the triumvirate which has controlled life in the South since the Civil War, keeping it nearly static. All three are slowly but surely on the way out. Industrialization is quickening the pace of the South's revolution. It is bringing opportunity to many who are no longer needed on the land. But the uneducated Negro sharecropper or tenant farmer is not yet welcome to the developing industry of the South. Where does he go? If he has a relative in a northern city, he may go there (if he can afford the fare) and join the already over-packed city slums. Or he joins the steadily increasing migrant stream.

NSF has long maintained that civil and political rights for the southern Negro go hand in hand with his struggle for economic advancement. In the states where Negroes (and poor whites) have the least education and the lowest standards of living, there is also the lowest percentage of voters. The figures on voter-turnout in the 1956 presidential election show Georgia, Alabama, South Carolina and Mississippi at the very bottom of the 48 states with the following percentages of voters per 100 persons of voting age, in respective order: 30.4%, 28.5%, 24.6%, 22.1%. This compares with a median percentage for all the states of 67%.

By far the largest number of farm families with cash incomes of less than $1,000 are in the South. These southern states need government help most in services to farmers such as adequate credit and employment, vocational, health and educational programs. A small step in this direction is being taken by the Department of Agriculture's Rural Development Program which has now completed its second year. Working in selected pilot counties, the program attempts to enlist the aid of various government agencies as well as business men, church groups, farm people and others. Admittedly a "bootstrap" operation, the program suffers from inadequate staff and financing and does not seem to rank high in the administration's plans for concentrated effort.

Economic pressures against the independent Negro farmer, sharecropper and tenant farmer continued to come to the attention of NSF. The Fund continued its interest in finding help for some and granted several loans from its own funds. However, NSF believes that the attainment of economic, social, and political rights is a primary responsibility of federal and local government. NSF attempts to bring the facts and the need for responsible action before the people and government through its literature, reports, conferences, and public statements.

LEGISLATION

No new legislation affecting farm workers was passed by the U.S. Congress during the year, although hearings were held on a bill to extend coverage of the minimum wage law to additional groups of workers including some agricultural workers. NSF supported this legislation. Testifying on behalf of the Fund before the House Subcommittee on Labor Standards, Dr. Lewis W. Jones of Tuskegee Institute presented facts and figures showing graphically the extent of sub-standard wages and living conditions of farm workers in the southern states. Pointing out that these farm workers are also seasonal, Dr. Jones said, "Under-employment of hired workers makes the small wages paid them while employed more distressing." A similar bill is expected to be introduced in 1958.

NSF SPONSORS NATIONAL CONFERENCE

In order to focus nation-wide attention on these serious problems, an all-day conference was held in New York on November 13th, bringing together representatives from government, labor, farm and civic groups. Sponsored by NSF and many distinguished Americans, the conference met in three round tables, heard experts, and adopted a series of recommendations for improving conditions for migrant and other farm labor, for investigating the government program for importing foreign farm labor and for help to the low-income family farmer.

A major conference recommendation called upon Secretary of Labor Mitchell to appoint a tripartite committee, consisting of representatives of the public, employers and labor to investigate the contract labor program, its abuses, its effect upon American farm workers' opportunities and standards, and its influence upon the competitive position of family farms.

Another major conference recommendation was that organized labor take responsibility for organizing farm workers into effective unions, recognizing that the present National Agricultural Workers Union lacks adequate funds and personnel to do this job. (With farm workers themselves having incomes too low to support an organizing campaign, the Agricultural Workers Union has received some financial support from other sympathetic unions and from NSF.)

Conference recommendations also called for federal and state legislation guaranteeing for farm workers minimum wages, unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, sickness and disability benefits, old age assistance, licensing and bonding of crew leaders, uniform standards for housing for migrant workers, enforcement of sanitary and health provisions for migrant camps, regulation of transportation for migrants and educational programs for their children. The conference called for a reversal of the present trend forcing thousands of farm families out of agriculture. Specific programs to help low income farmers were urged.

The conference approved a resolution urging the Board of Directors of NSF to "take the initiative in forming a nation-wide advisory board of distinguished Americans to bring the recommendations and concerns of this conference before the organized labor movement and the Congress of the United States." (Printed conference proceedings and literature list are available from NSF office.)

In existence for 20 years, the Fund finds growing opportunities for bringing these issues before the American public whose awareness and interest must be aroused before corrective measures will come.

Dear Dr. Fleming:

We have brought our special file up to date and it now includes your name as executive director of the Southern Regional Council. We will send you our reports and published material regularly in the belief that they will be of interest to you. Since copies of the proceedings of our recent conference as well as our reports have already gone out addressed to your predecessor, these have no doubt come to your attention.

On our part we are interested in seeing the material put out by the Southern Regional Council. Occasionally this comes to our attention from other sources but we would appreciate it very much if you would put us on your mailing list so that we will receive your reports and releases as issued.

Some time before the next year rolls around I will be in touch with you again concerning the possibility of a Southern Regional conference on the problem of low income farm people. When I was at Tuskegee several months ago for a conference of Professional Farm Workers, Dean Potts and I had a preliminary talk about the desirability of having a wider conference in the area bringing together many groups.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Friend,

The enclosed annual report of the National Sharecroppers Fund will bring you a concise and informative review of the past year's events as they relate to American farm and migrant workers.

While the future looks brighter than it has for a long time, the situation is still very serious. Right now thousands of these families in Arizona and Nevada are existing on private and public charity. The importation of nearly one-half million contract workers continues to thwart efforts to raise the living and working standards of the domestic workers.

Signs of progress to come are Secretary of Labor Mitchell's announced position in favor of a minimum wage for farm labor, and organized labor's reported plans for a real organizing drive for these workers on the large farms.

We hope you will find this report useful.

With good wishes always,

Sincerely yours,

Frank P. Graham

THE CONDITION OF FARM WORKERS IN 1958

REPORT TO THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND, INC.
by Fay Bennett, Executive Secretary

The great suffering brought to farm workers by the floods and freezes which delayed and destroyed crops in the southeast and Mississippi areas was the opening story of last year's annual report. Particularly hard hit were some 10,000 stranded migrant workers in Florida. Only this fall, October 30, 1958, has Sylvia Porter's column in the New York Post told the rest:

> "On the basis of those 11 nights [of the freeze] the Florida citrus industry is riding the greatest boom year in its entire history... Today, Florida's growers are being offered $2.25 to $2.75 a box on-tree for their early and mid-season orange crops. At this time a year ago, they were being offered $1.00 a box on-tree.....
> "To those of us who live in cities far removed from the citrus groves, the freeze of last winter has meant two things: sharply higher prices for fresh fruits and frozen juices and lower quality of fruit."

For the growers, it has meant quadrupled profits. For the workers, it was another year of hardship and below subsistence income.

Again in early 1959 - -

Cotton crop failures and ploughed-under cotton* in Arizona had thrown people out of work, and 300 of them headed north to Nevada on the rumor of work there. They found the harvest late, and other workers ahead of them, also waiting. An Associated Press story on February 26 reported,

> "For days they had barely enough food to keep alive. They camped - men, women and children - in the open, along ditch banks, without protection from winter rains and freezing night temperatures. They took their drinking water from irrigation ditches used by cattle. Many children were sick. And they had no work.
> "The only thing these people have to bargain with is their hunger," said Father Crowley, a Roman Catholic priest who brought relief collected locally.

The Life of Migrants

Housing. Migrant workers themselves consider bad housing and the inability to maintain sanitary conditions their most serious health menace, according to a twenty-one state survey made by the Home Missions Division of the National Council of Churches. Bad housing, flies, mosquitos, lack of screening, dirty beds and mattresses, unsanitary toilets and a lack of hot water and bathing facilities were among the evils most often named. One report told of a camp without water or toilets.

Health. Migrants need the same health services other people need, a bulletin of the Committee on Rural Health of the American Academy of General Practice has pointed out. But few migrants are immunized against common communicable diseases. Diarrheal disease, tuberculosis, and venereal disease are among conditions commonly reported.

Migrant health and injuries problems, made more serious by the conditions under which migrants live, have further complications. The very low income of the migrants is seldom capable of meeting the charge of medical care, and local welfare facilities are often not available to them because of residence restrictions.

A start has been made, at least in the distribution of information, by the United States Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, in its area guuides to Health Services in Major Migrant Work Areas.

Transportation. This is one area in which the federal government has attempted remedial action through the Interstate Commerce Commission. As with most matters relating to migrants, however, enforcement continues to be as great a problem as initial regulation. Again in 1958, a terrible tragedy underlined the unprotected position of migrants. Twelve Mexican Nationals died and 19 were seriously injured when fire from a spilled gasoline can blazed through the "ramshackle old flatbed truck that had been converted into a bus." The truck was enclosed by wooden sides and roofed with metal. Its only exits were two narrow openings at the rear, between rows of wooden benches, and each exit was barred by a chain fastened across it, so that the men were trapped.

An Oregon report on migratory labor was ironic about transportation of child workers. "The Interim Committee believes," it states, "that school children picking berries are entitled to the same safety protection as the berries receive when transported to market in a common carrier."

The situation is still one in which electric "blankets" protect crops while growers object to providing any blankets for men; cherries are better guarded in transit than children; and the United States takes a census of migratory birds but not of migratory workers.

The American Farm

Over-all trends in agriculture remained constant in 1958: Increase in the size of farms and decrease in the number of individual family farms continued. The number of people working on farms averaged 7,525,000 in 1958, according to the Department of Agriculture. Farm operators and unpaid members of their families comprised 5,570,000 of the monthly average -- 112,000 fewer than in 1957 and 2,027,000 fewer than in 1950. The hired working force approximated 1,955,000.

The spread of vertical integration, already affecting sugar beets, broilers, turkeys, vegetables, and some fruits, threatened to reduce still more family farmers from independent decision-makers to cogs in the wheel of big business. Vertical integration is the coordination and planning of the farmer's operation involving what, when, and how much to grow, where to get his fertilizer and feed and who shall process and purchase his finished product. A packing house or a large chain store may control the whole operation.

Mechanization continues without adequate planning for the surplus labor driven from the farms or for the estimated million people who now make their living by farming but will have to find another place in the economy within the next 15 years. Production will continue to rise, as it did this year 11 per cent above the previous record highs of 1948 and 1957.

The Budget

The President's budget, presented in January, 1959, estimated expenditures for agriculture programs in the fiscal year 1960 at six billion dollars; this is $779 million less than the estimate for the current year but $1.6 billion more than was actually spent in fiscal 1958. The main decrease results from termination of the acreage-reserve portion of the soil-bank program at the end of the 1958 crop year. Expenditures for price supports and other programs to stabilize farm prices and farm income will comprise about 75 per cent of the six billion total. For this fiscal year, it is estimated that the total cash wage of farm workers will be less than half the cost of price supports.

Contract Labor

It was assumed that, because of domestic unemployment and consequent increase in the supply of domestic workers, the importation of foreign workers would drop substantially in 1958. However, the reduction in number of foreign workers admitted, according to the Department of Labor, was only one per cent; and the figures on admission do not account for additional foreign workers admitted in previous years who are still here. The 1958 figures from the Labor Department's Bureau of Employment Security are:

Admitted from Mexico	432,857
Admitted from British West Indies	7,441
Admitted from Canada	6,900
Admitted from Japan	315
Total foreign workers admitted in 1958	447,513

Illustrations of the discrepancy between those admitted and those working include: the B.W.I. program in which importations (excluding Bahamians) were 5204 and yet the peak employment month showed 8,390; the Filipino program, which does not appear at all, but for which varying figures of 25, 27, and 33 are given for those still here; the Japanese program, in which about 1,000 previously admitted are still here. The Immigration Service lists also 95 from the French West Indies and 166 Basque sheep herders.

Puerto Rican workers, as citizens, are in a separate category. The 13,067 farm workers who came from Puerto Rico in 1958 represented a slight drop from 1957 and a 12 per cent drop from the all-time high of 14,876 in 1956. This was attributed to greater availability of domestic labor because of the recession. Despite recession conditions, a survey of prevailing wages resulted in a wage increase for Puerto Rican workers this year. Puerto Rican contract workers receive wage-and-hour guarantees, accident and illness insurance, and their housing and working conditions are subject to inspection.

Foreign Workers and Domestic Wages

Only a few examples can be given of many actual instances of the depressing effect of the use of foreign workers on American wages. Between August 1 and August 5, 1958, peach growers in Sutter County, California, had been paying 15 to 18 cents a box for picking. A labor shortage was certified and 933 Mexican Nationals were sent for; 700 arrived on August 7. On August 6, the chief of the State Farm Placement Service certified a base wage of 12 cents a box for the area. Similarly, over a ten-year period, wages of tomato pickers in the San Joaquin Valley have dropped 40 per cent at the same time that the proportion of Mexican Nationals used to pick them has risen to 90 per cent. In the Imperial Valley, hourly rates for farm labor were 70 cents in 1951 and they were still 70 cents in 1958. There is not always a wage cut; but there is usually a wage freeze.

In addition, Nationals are increasingly doing work one step removed from agriculture, sometimes replacing union labor with non-union labor, wages, and conditions. Operations are moved into the field, as in lettuce, when the union-organized packing shed was abolished and the packing is now done in the field by Nationals.

United States Nationals

The wonder is that, under these conditions, there still are domestic farm workers. But there are, and the latest figures released by the Department of Agriculture give $892.00 as the average annual income for the hired farm worker for the full year 1957. Average farm wage rates, which had increased steadily, if slowly, since 1947, were stabilized at $5.90 a day for 1956 and 1957. Fewer farm working days and fewer days of non-farm work contributed to a decrease in total income. When the 1958 totals are completed, they will show for the first time since 1950 a rise in the total number of hired farm workers and an increase in time worked, but not much variation in wage rates. A long-range trend appears to be an increasing proportion of women and youth in the total number of seasonal workers.

Child Labor and Low Wages

Part of the intensive survey of migratory labor recently made in Oregon reveals one reason for the continuance of child labor in commercial agriculture. The Bureau of Labor found these results of average median earnings for the previous (sample, not average) week:

Head of family	$32.36
Wife and children	48.00
Total	$80.36

Neither of these figures alone would have supported the family, especially since it typically finds work for less than half the year. No wonder the report further tells of an area in which everyone from age 7 up works, and that the story can be multiplied across the country.

Last year, 227,000 children between 10 and 13 were legally employed on farms as hired labor; that is, not working for their parents. Federal legislation protects children only during school hours. Twenty states set no minimum age for working children and other state laws vary; one protects children under 10, three protect children under 12, and so on.

National Agricultural Workers Union

The continued importation of foreign contract workers for farm work, lack of sufficient funds for organizing work, and continued exemption of farm workers from the legal protections given to industrial workers, have made the role of the NAWU more difficult than ever. Even the intermittent support sometimes given by a few of the more sympathetic unions was sharply curtailed. With its main support coming from its underpaid members and from its monthly grant from NSF, the farm labor union carried on what was essentially a holding operation. In California, the union's able secretary-treasurer, Ernesto Galarza, gave yeoman service to the rest of organized labor in helping to defeat the state's so-called "right to work" bill.

Perhaps the most significant and hopeful project of the union was initiated by its undaunted president, H.L.Mitchell, to supply to Pennsylvania growers a group of experienced farm-worker members of the union from Arkansas. These workers differed from the usual migrant crew in that their leader was a union representative and they had a contract with the growers providing for a minimum wage of not less than 75 cents an hour and a guarantee of regular work for 160 hours in each four-week period.*

This project proved highly satisfactory to the growers who were assured of a trained and stable work crew, while the workers were assured of a base pay and regular work. An experienced union officer, George Stith, worked along with the others in the fields and spent his off-hours travelling from farm to farm adjusting grievances of the workers.

The NAWU hopes to extend these arrangements for using union crews under contract in New York and New Jersey and eventually in other states. Such a system would go far to eliminate the worst hazards of migrant labor. It would also help to raise and stabilize the meagre incomes of the under-employed in some rural areas of the south.

As the year ended, there were strong indications that the top leadership of the AFL-CIO was prepared to give its backing to a drive to organize farm workers on the large corporate farms.

State Action

The beginning of state legislation, with Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey in the lead, should bring improvement in migrant living conditions; but it is still only a beginning. The number of state migrant committees continues to grow until it has now reached twenty. The Council of State Governments has made helpful suggestions, and a Committee of Officials on Migratory Labor of the Atlantic Seaboard States has made a whole series of recommendations for action in the fields of housing and transportation, health and welfare, licensing of crew leaders, elimination of residence requirements, barring child labor in agriculture, establishing minimum wages for farm labor, and developing governors' committees and state bureaus of migratory labor.

By far the most encouraging action for improvement of migrant conditions has come in the Pacific Northwest where government officials in the employment service have firmly applied the Department of Labor regulations which give preference to domestic farm workers over Mexican Nationals and provide for decent wages and working conditions. At first there was protest from growers who had grown to rely on imported braceros. But refusal by the Washington State Employment Service to supply Mexican Nationals when domestic workers were available and a corollary insistence that at least $1.00 an hour be paid has resulted in a state record for 1958 of no importation of foreign nationals and a common hourly rate of $1.25 for farm labor. What is more, the grower has a stable and dependable labor supply, and the worker has steadier work and increased income. This contrasts sharply with California and Texas, where local farm workers migrate out for jobs while the employment services certify labor shortages and bring in tens of thousands of low-priced Mexican Nationals.

National Advisory Committee on Farm Labor

National Sharecroppers Fund has played its part in both the development and the organization of this rising public concern for farm labor. Out of the successful conference sponsored by NSF in the fall of 1957 on "Migratory Labor and Low-Income Farmers" has come the National Advisory Committee on Farm Labor. This is an independent committee of distinguished Americans with Frank P. Graham and A. Philip Randolph serving as co-chairmen. Public hearings held in Washington on February 5 and 6, 1959, by the committee, heard witnesses from all over the country on various aspects of the farm labor problem, and heard Secretary of Labor Mitchell declare himself forcefully in favor of minimum-wage legislation, unemployment insurance, further safeguards for children, and national registration of crew leaders. There is much evidence that this new committee will give strong impetus to the growing sentiment for bringing to underpaid farm families the rights and conditions enjoyed by most other Americans.

National Sharecroppers Fund

The Fund is proud to have shared in this undertaking as it has been proud of its share in sponsoring the Migrant Children's Fund and its educational pioneering, and its support for the National Council on Agricultural Life and Labor. NCALL is a clearing house in which nearly forty organizations cooperate in exchange of information and planning for the needs of farm workers and the small family farmer. Located in Washington, it fulfills an important role in keeping in touch with legislative and other governmental developments on behalf of its member organizations.

Legislation. NSF tries to keep abreast of all important developments in the agricultural field, including current legislation. During the past year it has testified for preserving the law to protect family-sized farms by providing that no one ownership should get more than enough water to irrigate 160 acres from any government irrigation program, and against proposals to make permanent Public Law 78 under which the importation of Mexican Nationals is authorized. The latter was enacted in war labor-shortage years, yet today four times as many contract workers are imported as in 1943. The result has been a steady deterioration of the wages and conditions of domestic farm workers. Its immediate concerns now will be the measures it expects will be introduced into Congress, minimum wage and crew leader registration.

The Future: In view of aroused public concern as evinced by the open hearings in Washington, proposals for including farm workers under social legislation which now covers industrial workers, and possibilities of a real drive to organize farm workers by the AFL-CIO, NSF looks forward to an exciting year of increasing activity and positive achievement. The work of many years past may come to fruition if extra efforts are made in the immediate future to give public support to administrative, legislative and labor action on behalf of the nation's farm workers and their families.

THE CONDITION OF FARM WORKERS IN 1959

REPORT TO THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND, INC.
by Fay Bennett, Executive Secretary

"In a bad season, there is the specter of empty stomachs for their families...'In the last two days I ain't picked more than $2 worth of tomatoes,' said Tally, head bunched between his husky shoulders. 'That don't buy us much.'...When the harvest is good, migrants pick until their knees are sore and then they work standing..." ("Maryland's Migrant Workers," from the Washington Post-Times Herald, August 16-18, 1959.)

And, bad harvest or good harvest, it's, "Nope, ain't got no home; just any place we're at, that's my home," from an 11-year old boy; or a cry from a 10-year old newcomer to school, "I can't do that...I can't read... I ain't never gone to school enough to learn how...You see, we move around a lot." (Elizabeth Sutton in Migratory Labor Notes, July-September, 1959, from The American Child.)

The Life of Migrants

The year 1959 was full of a new public interest in the condition of migrants and other farm workers, from the Public Hearings of the National Advisory Committee on Farm Labor held in Washington last February to the National Conference to Stabilize Migrant Labor held in Chicago in November. But the conditions deplored at the close of the year were indistinguishable from the conditions described at the beginning. Progress over the span of years can certainly be seen. Yet these are still, in Secretary Mitchell's phrase, "excluded Americans."

Hired farm workers in 1958 (latest Department of Labor figures) numbered 2,319,000 for those working more than 25 days in farm labor. Of these approximately half a million were migrants.

Housing. The Maryland study quoted above reports that a 1957 state survey of housing conditions found that 66 per cent of the camps had unapproved water systems; that privies in 72 per cent of the camps were below minimum sanitary standards. The newspaper reporter found a camp with migrants living in small shacks, 8 by 10 feet, equipped with cots, a small cook stove, and a light bulb. Swarms of mosquitoes and flies made a depressing picture which can be duplicated across the country.

Health. Both the poverty of the migrants and the temporary nature of the situations in which they live increase their health hazards. The U.S. Public Health Service found that state residence requirements for aid, provided a major obstacle. "Major differences between requirements for public health and public welfare services nullify, in some instances, the tuberculosis efforts of the health agencies," it said. There is hope in news out of Washington that proposals are being made for federal aid in "general assistance" programs and to modify or end the residence qualifications of the various states.

Accidents. Agriculture still ranks as the third most hazardous industry. In highly industrialized New Jersey, farming had more work accidents in 1958 than any other industry - more than 100 a month. The latest overall figures, compiled by the National Safety Council, are: Farm death rates per 100,000, 54.3; total farm resident fatalities 11,300; injuries 950,000. Agriculture is the only industry in which the death rate has risen over the 10 year period 1948-58, with a rise of 4%.

But no statistics can convey the horror of the death of a 12-year old girl working on an Idado farm, caught in a potato-digging machine. (The local school system was having a "harvest vacation" so that the children could work in the fields.) Nor could a system of workmen's compensation make adequate recompense. But when accidents occur, it is worth reflecting that in most states agricultural workers, despite their high liability to accident, are not insured as are industrial workers - one more senseless "exclusion."

Transportation. New regulations tightening requirements for transportation of migrant workers brought in through international agreement with Mexico were announced by the Secretary of Labor last summer. But it took another appalling crash, in Arizona, in which fifteen Mexican farm workers were killed, to stimulate the change, and enforcement remains a major problem. As for domestic workers, it is still true that most states have not adopted legislation or policies implementing the Interstate Commerce Commission's regulations for transportation of migrant workers.

The American Farm

Output per worker in agriculture has increased 83 per cent since 1940, as compared to industry's 30 per cent. Illuminating local verification of our 1958 report of giantism in agriculture is found in a study prepared by the Houston, Texas, Chamber of Commerce Agriculture Committee, which titles its appraisal frankly, "Agribusiness." With the expansion of large farms and the decrease in the actual number of farmers in the United States, only 13 per cent of the population is now on farms, but 40 per cent of the labor force is engaged in agribusiness: that is, farm machinery and supplies, farm-product processors and wholesale (not retail) distributors. It is in the light of this that concentration of control through vertical integration should be examined. In 1940, the farmers' per capita investment amounted to $4,000; today it is $16,000. Around 1930, each farmer could provide food and fiber for himself and six other people; today the six has grown to nineteen.

Texas has followed the trend - or exemplified it. In 1930, farm workers were 40 per cent of its population; today they are 13.7 per cent. The number of farms has dropped steadily in the same period: half a million in 1930; just under 300,000 in 1959. But the average-sized 250-acre farm of 1930 has become an average 500 acres today. Average cash income has gone from $1,069 to $6,540; total farm income is up 221 per cent since 1940: from about six hundred million to almost two billion.

Net farm income keeps sagging, however. For the first three-quarters of 1959 it was estimated at 11.5 billion dollars, down 1.6 billion from the year before. Part of the reason is the marginal income of the 2.7 million farm families who produce only 10 per cent of the total farm output. Another two million families produce 90 per cent, and within this group the disparity between corporation farm and independent farm family is enormous. About 12 per cent of the farms grossed 60 per cent of all farm product sales in 1954.

Federal Aid. One of the problems is that most federal aid continues to go to the bigger farms and corporations. Senator Williams of Delaware has called attention to the 250 cotton producers who received government price-support loans of $100,000 or more on 1958 crops. The largest of these was nearly $1,500,000 (Westlake Farms, Inc., California).

Rural Development and Underemployment. The general trend in agriculture, described so briefly above, easily shows why a major problem for the country is the workers and families who have been driven out of farming, or those who have been reduced to a subsistence level. It would seem that millions would be better spent in rural re-development.

Yet the federal Rural Development Program is still only what Senator Douglas has called "a timid experiment," operating on a year-to-year, hand-to-mouth basis (though it is reported that permanent status will be asked this year). A farm publication has pointed out that the Department of Agriculture estimates RDP's annual cost (it has no budget of its own) at two million dollars, which is just about what it costs the department to store surplus crops for 36 hours. The outstanding illustration of what can be done about low-income farming and depressed areas remains the TVA.

Food for Peace

On the credit side, President Eisenhower on his recent trip abroad apparently endorsed a Food for Peace program which had lacked his support previously. This may make possible elimination of some "overproduction" by sharing our surplus with the 60 per cent of the world's people who lack adequate diets as well as other material comforts. Also after a fifteen-year effort, Congress has now passed a food stamp act, effective January 1, 1960, which will use surplus to help the needy in this country. The act is only permissive; that is, surpluses must be requested by a state or political subdivision, but at least this is an advance.

Contract Labor

The Department of Justice, Immigration Service, "report of aliens admitted to the United States as agricultural laborers" for the year ending June 30, 1959, is as follows: Mexico (under Public Law 78) - 447,535; Canada - 6,892; British West Indies - 8,671; French West Indies 56; British Guiana - 99; Japanese - 607; Sheepherders (Basque) - 227.

As always, use of these figures is subject to caution. The total admitted was 464,087; the total that left again was 447,953, although 301,466 were re-admitted. However, there still may be carry-overs from previous years. All that can be said safely is that the figure of imported contract workers has been stabilized over a period of years at between 450,000 and 500,000 and that the figure for this year may be slightly above that for 1958.

Although recent press reports emanating from the Philippine's Labor Secretary indicated a Filipino program for sending farm workers to the United States, the Immigration Service says that no petitions for their importation have been approved since March 4, 1957. Since Department of Labor monthly reports gave a combined peak figure for Japanese and Filipinos (October 1-15, 1959) as 1,600, it would appear that a certain number of Filipinos admitted when that program originated in 1956 are still here.

Foreign Workers and Domestic Wages

The first illustration of this problem given in last year's report was of peaches in Sutter County, California; for this year the peach crop aroused national attention, with press reports of the crop rotting due to a shortage of peach pickers. Background is important. When miscalculations on the part of growers combined with weather conditions which runted the crop, peach growers felt the only place left to cut expense, to save profits, was on harvest wages. But the growers were frightened by two possibilities: 1) an organizing campaign was going on among farm workers, who wanted better instead of worse wages; 2) a scandal in the state placement service regarding its handling of the Mexican program* threatened the supply of Mexican workers used in previous years to keep wages down. Hence a dramatic publicity campaign was developed; 30 newspaper men and editors were flown into the area in chartered planes; the cry of ruin was raised. The union consistently reported domestic workers available, but the grower pressure was successful; the Mexicans arrived. The wage rate (which last year dropped from 15-18 cents a box to 12 when Mexican workers arrived) this year started at 15 (14 in Sutter County) and at times was only 12. The domestic workers never had a chance.

*Involving illegal use of Mexican labor when domestic labor was available, profiteering in feeding of workers, failure to forward premiums on workers' insurance and inadequate medical care.

Agricultural wages in the United States are in a relatively worse position than similar wages are for most other industrial nations. This is shown in a report in the International Labour Review for November, 1959, which points out that farm wages in the U.S. have gone up less in the ten-year period, 1948-1957, than in any other of the western nations.

Investigation of the Mexican Program

Partially as the result of renewed public attention to the plight of farm workers, a committee was appointed by the Secretary of Labor to study the program for imported Mexican workers, by far the largest group of foreign contract workers each year. The committee found that United States workers in some instances have been deprived of job opportunities, their working season shortened, and wages and earnings held down by employment of the foreign workers; that Mexicans are being used increasingly in year-round and skilled occupations contrary to the original intent of the legislation authorizing the program, Public Law 78; that wage rates for such Mexicans have lagged behind the wage levels for farm work generally; that employers of Mexicans tend to pay less to American farm help than those who use domestic workers only.

It recommended authorization to the Secretary of Labor to tighten such loopholes to ensure that domestic workers receive preference and suffer no adverse effects from the importation of foreign workers.

Puerto Rican Workers

Puerto Rican workers who came to the mainland for farm labor in 1959, under contracts supervised by their labor department's migration office, numbered 10,012, a 20% drop from the previous year. Two main factors contributed to the decrease: 1) mechanization; and 2) employers recruited on their own. Avoiding the placement of orders for workers with the Puerto Rican labor office, these employers got in touch directly with workers on the Island whom they had employed previously under contract. Without the contract, the workers lost the protection of specified wages, guaranteed hours of work, insurance coverage, and minimum housing standards. One tragic result of this irresponsible recruiting brought death to two Puerto Rican workers. Recruited to spray crops in Massachusetts, the men died from contact with the poisonous insecticide. There was no insurance and no compensation for their families.

Child Labor

In the 1958 fiscal year, inspectors of the Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Division found 4,491 children, 3,194 of them under 14, illegally working in the fields.

But the far larger problem is that nearly half a million children can work legally in agriculture due to lack of protection by state or federal law. The little girl who died in Idaho was such a child. Twenty states set no minimum age whatsoever and many other state laws are deficient. It is hoped that this condition may be corrected, at least in part, by amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act which would extend its protections to children in agriculture. Hearings are now being held by the Senate Subcommittee on Migratory Labor on this and other farm labor bills.

National Agricultural Workers Union

A most important development of the past year was the decision of the AFL-CIO to finance and support a campaign to organize agricultural workers, starting with a selected area in California. In that drive, which is continuing, the Secretary-Treasurer and other members of the National Agricultural Workers are participating.

The NAWU itself celebrated its 25th anniversary in Memphis on October 17, 1959, and is planning to publish a pictorial history of the Union. The Union has announced an organizing drive in the South. The campaign will aim to organize year-round workers on cotton plantations, seasonal farm labor employed in harvesting cotton, fruits and vegetables, and tractor drivers and other skilled farm machine operators. It hopes also to expand the program of supplying union farm workers from under-employed areas to New Jersey, New York and Pennsylvania.

State Action

Legislation dealing with farm workers was introduced in 18 states and enacted in 11, an unusual amount of activity indicating some response to rising public concern. As the result of a legislative committee report, Oregon took action along many lines: crew-leader registration, transportation, labor camps, education for children. California tightened its safety regulations for transportation and introduced a fee for filing for a contractors' license. Florida, Connecticut and Maryland improved their regulations for labor camps. Ohio, New Jersey, and New York increased their aid to migrant education. California amended its workmen's compensation law to provide coverage for farm workers in the same manner as other workers, but Wyoming removed the coverage formerly required so that agricultural workers are included now only if the employer so elects. The National Advisory Committee on Farm Labor has published a valuable study, "The Position of Farm Workers in Federal and State Legislation," which can be obtained by writing to the National Sharecroppers Fund. The number of states that now have committees on migratory labor has increased to twenty-five.

National Sharecroppers Fund

The Fund has continued its support for and cooperation with many organizations concerned with varying aspects of farm problems, especially the Migrant Children's Fund, the National Advisory Committee on Farm Labor, and the National Council on Agricultural Life and Labor through which forty organizations cooperate in exchange of information and planning and receive valuable service in keeping abreast of Washington developments.

The Fund supported proposals to improve Department of Labor standards in interstate recruitment of farm workers last September, and it appeared at Senate subcommittee hearings held in New York last December.

The Fund continued its efforts to preserve the 160-acre limitation in the interest of family-sized farms, worked for legislation in various fields affecting farm-worker interests, and distributed information on other aspects of migrant life such as housing and health. Although passage has not yet been secured, nevertheless a certain measure of success is indicated by the very introduction of bills calling for crew-leader registration; extension of minimum-wage coverage to agricultural workers; inclusion of child workers in agriculture under the protections of the Fair Labor Standards Act for other children; and bills to provide credit to farmers to build approved housing for migrants. Hearings on these have been held in many parts of the country, by the newly formed Senate Subcommittee on Migratory Labor.

We are deeply encouraged by the increased interest in the problems with which we have been concerned for over 20 years. Requests for information from college students, teachers, libraries, unions, church groups and other social action and citizen organizations bring evidence of an ever-widening interest which is our greatest hope that this neglected group will not remain "excluded Americans."

Rec'd 3/14/60

Dear Friend:

The enclosed annual report on "The Condition of Farm Workers in 1959" gives encouraging evidence of increased interest and some action on behalf of farm and migrant workers. Yet in Secretary of Labor Mitchell's words, they are still "excluded Americans."

The report details the sub-standard housing, overly-high accident rate, inadequate health and welfare facilities, and wide use of child labor which are still the lot of migrant farm families. It shows how the low-wage standards were further reduced as a result of the importation of nearly one-half million contract laborers, even when domestic labor was available.

As an indication of rising public concern, the report states that in 1959 "legislation dealing with farm workers was introduced in 18 states and enacted in 11." However, it concludes that the need for additional protective legislation -- both state and federal -- is great, and the report points hopefully to present bills before Congress to cover farm workers under minimum wage and child labor laws, and to provide for federal registration of crew leaders and loans to growers for approved housing for migrants. Another source of hope is the continuing drive to organize farm labor in California under the auspices of the AFL-CIO.

We are glad to join with other organizations in enlightening the American public with regard to these developments. We believe you will find the report informative and useful.

Sincerely yours,

Frank P. Graham

Dear Miss Bennett:

I am sorry things did not work out with Mr. Ocie Lee Smith. I don't know of anyone else to recommend but I will let you know if anyone turns up.

I read your program statement and have no suggestions at all to offer. It is excellent and I found it instructive.

Best wishes.

Dear Dr. Dunbar:

Thank you for sending me a copy of Herman Long's letter evaluating the capabilities of Ocie Lee Smith. It appeared to us that Mr. Smith was just the man for our position in the South and we got in touch with him immediately. We thought we had the matter clinched but have just learned that he felt it necessary to take another job.

We are sorry that we were not able to employ Mr. Smith. He seems to have the necessary background and personal qualifications which we are looking for.

Meanwhile our program is moving forward in Tennessee and we believe that Fayette County will soon have a bi-racial committee set up eligible for receiving technical assistance and federal aid under the Area Redevelopment Program. We do have Allen Yancey, Jr. working for us this summer on this program and Mr. Yancey will continue to work for us on a part-time basis when he begins his teaching post at Lane College this fall.

In the meantime our Board may continue the search for a full time person to carry forward this work. If you learn of other qualified candidates please let us know.

Sincerely yours,

Fay Bennett

Dear Miss Bennett:

The only comment I can make regarding the progress report of your Tennessee program is that it offers a good example of what can be accomplished when an organization is willing to work hard against tough odds and even for piece-meal gains.

Thank you for discussing with me last week the possible South Carolina project. We will let you know how this develops.

With best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

Dear Dr. Dunbar:

I am enclosing a progress report on our Tennessee program. As it shows, progress has been difficult. Nonetheless, we are pleased that some progress is being made.

We believe we have gained valuable experience in how to work in Southern rural communities to bring about a greater awareness and participation in federal aid programs to those who need them and who have been by-passed for too long.

To share our experience with you and others concerned, we are planning a Southern conference in the late spring. I shall write to you again shortly about the proposed conference to get your ideas and suggestions.

Meanwhile I would appreciate your reactions to the enclosed report. Have you seen our pamphlet "Sharecroppers in the 60's" which explains our program more fully?

Sincerely yours,

Fay Bennett

PROGRESS REPORT ON NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND TENNESSEE PROGRAM

FEBRUARY 1, 1962

The eviction last winter of 700 sharecroppers in Fayette and Haywood Counties, Tennessee, in reprisal for their registering to vote, focused attention on the vulnerability of low-income Southern rural families to political and economic pressure. This report summarizes the program of the National Sharecroppers Fund to help these disadvantaged farm families become aware of programs which might aid them and to help them qualify for such aid. Since June, 1961, this program has resulted in:

(1) Providing information to hundreds of low-income farmers about the various federal loan and aid programs available to them.
(2) Filing of over 100 new applications for one or more of these programs.
(3) More careful and democratic processing of these applications by the local Farmer's Home Administration offices, which brought about the approval of some loan applications previously turned down.
(4) Designation of Fayette County as a depressed area eligible for Area Redevelopment Administration aid.
(5) Organization of a representative bi-racial committee prepared to administer this ARA aid.
(6) Distribution of federal surplus food to those in need.

In the spring of 1961, the passage of the Area Redevelopment Act by Congress reflected wide public concern for people in the nation's many depressed rural and urban areas. The National Sharecroppers Fund, which has worked for over twenty years on behalf of farm workers and low-income farmers, was especially hopeful that the $100 million appropriation earmarked for depressed rural areas would be effectively used for the benefit of the millions of Americans, many of whom are tenant farmers, sharecroppers, and hired farm workers, who now live a marginal existence in areas of declining farm opportunities.

The National Sharecroppers Fund surveyed the existing federal programs, such as the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Rural Areas Development Program and Farmer's Home Administration loan programs, and found that in many areas of the South--where a high proportion of the nation's depressed rural areas are located--local administration of these programs was perhaps the greatest obstacle in the path of progress. Since many local Southern government and business leaders have a vested interest in perpetuating the status quo, with complete economic and political control of their areas, democratic and truly representative administration of these programs must be instituted if those who need economic opportunity are to benefit. Traditionally, local advisory and administrative committees, operating within the segregated USDA framework throughout the South, have been composed almost exclusively of members of the existing power structure, and have operated in the interests of the few, not of the many. In some circumstances, such as those resulting from the growing demand among Southern Negroes for their rights as citizens, these programs have even been used as weapons of economic intimidation.

The NSF Board initiated a pilot project in an effort to broaden the composition of local committees administering federal programs, and to alert sharecroppers and tenants in the areas to the existence of these programs. (Many farmers were either completely unaware of the programs or did not realize that they could qualify under their provisions.)

Fayette and Haywood Counties were selected for the pilot project because of their obvious great need for help and because this area had local Negro leadership concerned with getting this help. The population of the two counties is made up largely of low-income tenants and sharecroppers, and is three-quarters Negro. The white minority has maintained a virtual monopoly of economic and political power and has not hesitated to use it to thwart the aspirations of the majority.

The National Sharecroppers Fund was fortunate to be able to employ as its Tennessee representative Mr. Allen Yancey, Jr., holder of a Master's Degree from Tuskegee and a member of the faculty of nearby Lane College in Jackson, Tennessee. Mr. Yancey is a native of Fayette County, and has been active in public affairs there.

Mr. Yancey began his work in June, 1961, with meetings in Washington with government officials responsible for the various federal assistance programs for rural areas, and with representatives of concerned private organizations. He then began an intensive educational program in Fayette and Haywood Counties, speaking at meetings of church, civic, fraternal, and farmers' groups, and explaining the programs and how the individual sharecropper and tenant farmer could qualify for them. These meetings, which have continued throughout the year, have resulted in a sharp increase in new applications for FHA Ownership and Operating loans. In addition, Mr. Yancey assisted in the preparation of these applications and followed them up to ensure fair processing. His complaints to the federal FHA concerning selected cases resulted in an investigation of the Fayette County FHA office in the summer of 1961.

During the summer of 1961, Mr. Yancey also distributed information on federal scholarship programs to high school students in the area, and held several advisory meetings with labor, church, and civic leaders in western Tennessee.

The National Sharecroppers Fund joined in the successful demand that the federal surplus food program be extended to Fayette and Haywood Counties. Despite declarations from state and local welfare officials that this federal aid was not needed, some 4,000 persons in the area are at present receiving surplus food. Mr. Yancey provided the USDA with documented evidence of suffering among evicted farmers and others in the area, together with evidence that federal aid in the form of farm loans was being withheld from many Negroes who had registered to vote. The U.S. Department of Justice suit against white landowners, which resulted in a temporary injunction against further evictions, followed upon proof that many evictions were a direct result of the movement for voter registration.

The National Sharecroppers Fund also requested the federal government to include both counties in the Area Redevelopment program, and Fayette County was designated eligible in July, 1961. Haywood County is expected to be included in the near future.

There is other evidence of federal attention to the Fayette-Haywood situation: an FHA official visited Haywood County to accept personally loan applications from Negroes who were unable to file applications with the local officials; in one week of December, 1961, almost 90 new applications were received by the Washington representative of FHA; after a letter to Secretary Freeman describing racial discrimination in the hiring of personnel for the surplus food program in the area, several jobs were opened to Negroes.

Since the designation of Fayette County as a Rural Development area in July, the major efforts of the NSF and Mr. Yancey have been directed toward establishing a representative bi-racial committee to administer the program locally, to assure full effectiveness of the program in helping the low-income farmers who comprise the vast majority of the population. Mr. Yancey attempted first to interest white leaders in a representative committee, but received no cooperation. He then formed a 16-member committee, composed of farmers, businessmen, teachers, and ministers of both races. This committee prepared tentative proposals for economic development projects to utilize the crops grown in the area and to provide employment in their processing. Four members of this committee came to Washington on October 30, 1961, to request federal technical assistance to develop their proposals in detail, and to help them draw up an Overall Economic Development Program for Fayette County--a basic requirement for Area Redevelopment Administration aid. After meetings with officials of the Area Redevelopment Administration (under the Commerce Department) and of the Rural Areas Development Program (under the Agriculture Department), the Rural Electrification Administration was requested to provide this assistance. However, REA representatives who went to Fayette County failed to interest the local electrical cooperative in initiating an economic development project under the local committee's sponsorship. Neither has the REA yet made any progress in giving technical assistance to Mr. Yancey's committee for a specific project, as was directed by the USDA at the October 30th meeting. A major reason for these delays has been the formation of another ARA local committee under the chairmanship of I. V. Luck, local judge and businessman appointed routinely by the governor. This second committee is made up of local white business and political leaders and includes five persons under federal indictment for interfering with the civil rights of local Negroes.

NSF has recently received new assurances from REA and ARA officials in Washington that they are making every effort to overcome the problems of local resistance and to give technical and financial aid to those who need and request it.

The National Sharecroppers Fund sees the Fayette pilot project as a test case whose success or failure has important implications for the entire South. Many white leaders have indicated that they consider out-migration of Negroes as a major solution to the threat of voter registration drives. NSF believes that the establishment of a sound rural economy in low-income Southern areas provides the basic solution to the economic and social problems that all Southerners, Negro and white, must face.

INTEROFFICE MEMO

Date January 29, 1962

To: Les Dunbar From: Jim Moss

Subject:

This has to do with two requests for assistance with research on the Negro farmer in the South. While I would like to deal with them individually, somehow I can't seem to get their inter-connections out of my mind.

Lunch with Bob Thompson of the Atlanta Urban League brought out the possibility of, and the need for, pulling together information on the changing status of the Negro farmer in North Georgia. As I sensed his concern, it focused on this: with the gradual expansion of metropolitan Atlanta and the adjoining counties, does the Negro farmer stand to gain or lose in the transition? Is his present economic situation such that he may be pressured to sell his farm even at some considerable loss to himself? A next question appears to be -- given the knowledge of and access to Federal aid programs in agriculture, would he be encouraged to develop his farm on a more sound economic basis and thereby be encouraged to remain where he is? A third consideration may well involve informing the Negro farmers of ways in which a transfer of their land to other uses may be effected with a reasonable profit or gain to themselves. As you can well see, this is not a problem unique to North Georgia, but a problem confronting the absorption of rural populational elements into the burgeoning requirements of growing metropolitan centers -- particularly acute now in the more rural areas of the South.

We have committed ourselves to an enlarged research program in the Deep South and, I believe, in the rural South. This then is my proposal, and as I can most briefly state it the suggestion that I made to Bob Thompson. I suggest that we consider either making a grant ourselves or seek financing from Federal or private sources to undertake a pilot study of the social and economic posture of the Negro farmer in a selected number of counties in North Georgia. This is where the memo becomes confusing. I would like simultaneously to support the request for research assistance to undertake a study of Federal agriculture programs in South Carolina made by the South Carolina Council. It may well be that we ought to include a small study carried out along these lines in either Mississippi or Alabama, or both. I see these studies being carried out programatically within a format similar to our employment studies but much more tightly supervised and carried out with the assistance of more knowledgeable persons in the field.

If you want to go into a few more specifics I would suggest that a small grant be given to an economist or sociologist in the area to draw up a working paper on the North Georgia counties that could then be used as the basis for discussion with people who might become involved in the project in South Carolina, Mississippi and Alabama. What do you think about this? Shall we proceed along these lines?

Dear Dr. Dunbar:

I am writing to bring you up to date on our Tennessee program, to outline our present plans for a Southern conference to aid low-income farm families, and to ask for your suggestions.

A recent development in our Fayette County program gives us cause for real optimism: the Rural Electrification Administration has recently sent technical experts to Fayette County to meet with the 16-member bi-racial development committee under Allen Yancey's leadership. Several possible industrial development projects, to provide permanent employment to the sharecroppers of the area, were discussed. Federal financial support through the Area Redevelopment Administration appears definitely possible. A concrete proposal for this aid will be submitted within several weeks.

The purpose of our planned Southern conference for low-income farmers is to spread knowledge of available federal and private programs designed to alleviate rural poverty and to develop economic and social progress. The conference is aimed at bringing together local leaders from depressed Southern rural areas, both those eligible for ARA aid and others. Staff members of concerned organizations and government personnel working in these programs will be invited to attend as participants and observers.

The theme of the conference will center around "The People and Their Problems -- How Low-Income Farm Families Can Secure a Better Life."

While we had hoped the conference would take place this spring, it now is being planned for the fall. We would like your suggestions on the best time, to avoid conflict with farming activities and to encourage participation of staff and government people. Suggested dates are:

October 26-28; November 2-4; November 9-11.

Suggested places for the conference are:

Franklinton Center, Bricks, N.C.
Gatlinburg, Tennessee
Atlanta, Georgia
Memphis, Tennessee
Louisville, Kentucky

Dear Leslie: I know you are busy with your own work & I don't want to bother you with a long letter. Perhaps you can give us a short letter, or a phone call, with your suggestions. We are trying to get a Southern conference on the Rural Poverty Problem in October or November. Please let us know what you think. Thanks for your help. Sincerely, Rowland Watts

"POINT 4" for the RURAL SOUTH: National Sharecroppers Fund Proposal

The Background

The rural South is undergoing a revolution today which affects all Americans. This revolution of the traditional Southern agricultural economy underlies the movement for civil rights throughout the nation and the headlined effects of social conflict in industrial cities. During the last decade, it has produced the greatest Negro migration from the South in history: 1.5 million have left the rural South, and most have gone to the slums of the industrial centers. It is a strong factor in the development of high unemployment levels in the national economy since 1958.

The revolution has its roots in the sharp decline of small-scale farms, especially cotton farms, in the South. The number of American farms has dropped steadily during the past decade, but nowhere as rapidly as in the 16 Southern states. Between 1940 and 1959, the total number of farms decreased by 39 per cent across the nation, but by 45 per cent in the South. During the same period, farms operated by Negroes -- almost entirely in the South -- declined by 60 per cent. Today, only 121,000 sharecroppers remain in the South, of whom a majority are Negroes. This is less than one fifth of the total twenty years ago. And there are indications that the rate at which farmers are being forced off the land is increasing, as consolidation of land into large mechanized holdings continues.

Agriculture is becoming increasingly polarized between a group of about 50,000 corporation farms and about 1.7 million (half of all U.S. farms) small family units that produce less than $2,500 a year income per family. The USDA reports that "Over 15 million rural people live under conditions of dire poverty... over half the poverty in America is rural poverty." Much of the remaining poverty, it may be assumed, is the result of the influx of uneducated, untrained persons from rural areas who have come to the cities to compete for a diminishing number of unskilled jobs.

Not more than 10 per cent, perhaps only 5 per cent, of the youth growing up in rural America will be able to earn a livelihood on the farm. Yet the opportunities and standards of rural education, necessary to prepare them for other work, are the lowest in the country. A recent study showed that 67 per cent of recent migrants from rural areas had only a grade school education, and only 10 per cent were high school graduates. The Department of Health, Education and Welfare recently stated that one quarter of all American Negroes were "functionally illiterate," i.e., without five years of education.

For the displaced Southern farmer and his family, therefore, the alternatives to city slums are greatly limited. Irregular employment in agriculture as a "day haul" worker or a member of a migrant stream are the only "opportunities" open to most ex-farm operators who remain in a rural setting. A recent study of 202 migrant farm workers in the eastern seaboard migrant stream showed that 161 were former sharecroppers or tenants forced off the land by the agricultural revolution. Another 31 were children of farm families who could not find employment near their homes when they left school.

Existing Federal Programs

Public concern with the effects of this agricultural revolution has largely centered on its manifestations, such as unemployment and automation, city housing and juvenile delinquency, public schools and the movement to the urban suburbs. Until very recently, there has been little attention given to meeting the problem at its roots in the depressed rural areas of the nation, especially in the South.

It is in areas such as Fayette County, Tennessee, where 70 per cent of the population are Negro sharecroppers who earn an average of $1,140 a year per family, that the revolution is now gathering momentum.

Within the past several years, federal programs designed to enable small farmers to remain on the land and, where that is not possible, to assist in the transition of declining rural areas to semi-industrialized economies able to provide non-farm employment to displaced farmers, have been strengthened. The Area Redevelopment Act of 1961 provides over $100 million for industrial development, public works, and retraining projects for designated rural areas. If properly administered and fully understood by those whom the programs are intended to benefit, they could make important contributions to the solution of these pressing national problems. These programs include the ARA, the USDA's Rural Development Program (RAD), the various Farmers Home Administration loans, the rural provisions of the 1961 Housing Bill, and the 1962 Manpower Training Act.

Obstacles

But two basic obstacles have impaired the effectiveness of these federal programs to date: 1) the lack of knowledge among rural families of these programs and the conditions of eligibility, and 2) their local administration by political and business interest groups not always sympathetic to the needs of low-income farm families, especially when they happen to be Negroes.

These obstacles are especially serious because federal programs require "local initiative" in their planning and administration. All ARA grants and loans must be requested by local committees organized for the purpose. Farmers Home Administration loan applications too must be approved by local 3-man committees. By law, such local control must be "representative," but as a spokesman for the USDA points out:

> "In some local areas, persons belonging to labor unions and certain church, racial, or nationality groups may customarily be omitted from the decision-making associations within the area and community. Yet national and international considerations require that these persons be counted in on the area development decision-making process. We strongly hope and urge that all area planning committees will be broadly representative, both responsive and responsible to all segments of the local population. Anybody who has not been invited should elbow his way in if that is the only way."

In this statement, the Department is referring to the fact that only one County FHA committee in the United States is known to have a Negro member, and that ARA committees are normally composed of local business leaders and Chamber of Commerce officials, often of anti-union persuasion and determined to preserve their political and economic power. In Fayette County, Tennessee, for example, the official ARA Committee of seven members includes 5 under indictment for interfering with the civil rights of local Negroes.

John A. Baker, Director of Agricultural Credit, and head of the USDA's Rural Development Program, states that "Democratic government is responsive, not compulsive" -- it cannot act unless local persons request aid, or complain of unequal treatment of minority groups. In short, the federal government, while in many cases sympathetic to the efforts of low-income rural families to better their condition, cannot take the initiative in broadening the administrative committees of its rural programs to make them more responsive to local needs, and therefore, more effective in achieving their goals.

At the same time, the traditions of the rural South are based upon the systematic exclusion of small farmers, labor unions, and Negroes from local politics and commerce. A power structure has become entrenched in most Southern communities that resists efforts to change the economic and political structure of their areas. The first ARA project, for example, a shirt factory in rural Arkansas, received guarantees from local officials that unions will never be permitted to organize its employees. In turn, most Southern employers have continued to limit opportunities for Negro workers to menial jobs, a tradition also supported by most local offices of the U.S. Employment Service.

It is questionable, therefore, whether sufficient trained leadership is presently available in the rural South to initiate requests for federal aid. The experience of the National Sharecroppers Fund (see attached reports) in its Fayette County pilot project shows that some time is necessary for farmers who have never known of the possibility of aid to acquaint themselves with the various programs, eligibility requirements, and channels through which applications and/or complaints are received. On the other hand, our experience also clearly shows that with education and aid, local leadership can make substantial progress.

Proposal

The National Sharecroppers Fund proposes now to broaden its pilot project in Tennessee with a two-year program of education and technical assistance -- a "point 4" program on a regional scale. Proposed co-directors of this two-year program are Dr. Frank P. Graham, formerly president of the University of North Carolina, and Dr. C. G. Gomillion, Tuskegee Institute. They will direct the work of ten qualified field workers who will work in depressed rural areas in the South, discussing directly with local leaders from church, farmer, civil rights, and labor organizations the federal aid which is available. At the same time, the field workers would function as channels through which complaints may be received and followed up by appropriate government agencies. Experience indicates that a minimum of two years will be necessary for solid results to be achieved, during which time local leadership would be trained to carry on the work.

Areas in which the field workers would function would be carefully selected in terms of need and community acceptance. At present, a majority of rural counties in the Southern states are designated eligible for government aid under the ARA. FHA committees exist in all areas. The Manpower Training Bill and Housing Act apply throughout the South. In some sections of the South, local progress is already being made in such fields as voter registration.

In the selection of areas of work, the National Sharecroppers Fund would proceed only after full consultation with local community leaders interested in economic progress, federal agency officials, and other concerned groups. Requests have already been received from some rural areas for assistance similar to that extended to Fayette County. A conference for low-income families to advance this program is planned in the South for this fall.

The present resources of the National Sharecroppers Fund require additional financial support for this program. Funds would be needed to cover salaries and expenses of the field workers estimated at $10,000 a year, or a total of $200,000 for the two year program. NSF will expect to provide from its own budget all supporting funds such as printing, postage, telephone, public education, and additional travel expenses.

Dear Mr. Anthony:

I am enclosing a copy of my letter of March 29th to Dr. Leslie Dunbar. It contains the suggestions for our planned Southern conference. I will be grateful for your thinking on the questions raised. I hope, too, that you will have an opportunity to discuss the conference with Leslie Dunbar so that we may have the benefit of his ideas as well.

I find that I have sent the letter to Mr. Courtney Siceloff so he will know what you are talking about when you ask him about Penn Community Services in Frogmore, S.C., as a possible site for the conference.

Also enclosed is a proposal for a two-year program to make possible an expanded effort throughout the South to insure that federal aid and private programs reach the groups at the bottom of the economic and social scale most in need of help. Our experience in Fayette County, Tennessee, is that the government will respond when local groups organize and request technical assistance and federal loans. The problem which we hope to meet is to reach those in need of this aid who are not even aware that such programs exist and to help them qualify for this aid.

I am enclosing an extra copy of the proposal, along with a carbon of this letter, so that you may pass these along to Dr. Dunbar.

I hope to hear from you soon and to have your suggestions on both these items. It was good to talk with you on the telephone today.

Sincerely yours,

Fay Bennett

Dear Miss Bennett:

Several of us have discussed at length your fall conference and the proposed two-year program. Generally, we think both are excellent and needed.

I have discussed this with Courtney Siceloff and trust he has written you by now. In thinking about the matter further and in talking with him, it seems to me that Penn would be a particularly good site for the conference. The costs, facilities and setting are all favorable but the prospect of interesting Penn in becoming a continuing participant in your program seems especially desirable.

For your two year project South Carolina would undoubtedly be considered as one area of work. Alice Spearman and Ira Kaye (whom you have listed as suggested sponsors) are now attempting to develop a program of rural work for the South Carolina Council on Human Relations. If they have not done so, I hope they will share their ideas with you. Certainly they will be enthusiastic participants in the conference.

One name occurs to us as an addition to the participants list: Norman Jimerson, Director, Alabama Council on Human Relations, Room 1224, Comer Building, Birmingham 3. Beyond that I would think that Will Campbell, Ruby Hurley and C. G. Gomillion could be relied on most strongly for suggestions.

In the matter of SRC participation, Leslie Dunbar feels it would be best to have us represented by the field director or research director, possibly both.

For the conference and your two-year program, we are available to be of any possible assistance to you and NSF. Please call on us if it appears there is anything we can do in these very worthwhile efforts.

Sincerely,

Preliminary Announcement of a
Southern Conference to Aid Low-Income Rural Families

FARM PEOPLE AND THEIR PROBLEMS:

HOW LOW-INCOME RURAL FAMILIES CAN SECURE A BETTER LIFE

PROGRAM: Speakers, panels, and conference participants will discuss the various aid and development programs of the federal government, and the roles of local, private, and government agencies in promoting economic development and social progress.

DATES: November 14-16, 1962

PLACE: Franklinton Center, Bricks, North Carolina

COST: Approximately $12 for room and board for the duration of the conference. Car pools will be organized, and some funds may be available to assist those who could not otherwise attend.

The past decade has seen millions of people uprooted from their homes in the rural South. The continuing decline of opportunities in small-scale farming and the lack of alternative employment have forced low-income rural families, many without adequate education and vocational training, off the land without the means to better their lives elsewhere. This conference is called to discuss the problems and needs of these rural families and to learn what can be done to improve life in Southern rural communities. Various programs are going forward in the South to meet the needs of rural families. Among them is a program in Fayette County, Tennessee, sponsored by the National Sharecroppers Fund to help local residents use available federal funds for the economic development of their community. Other groups, too, are gaining experience in working toward economic and social progress. The conference will facilitate the sharing of these experiences and help to demonstrate how rural families, working together with government and private agencies, can help themselves.

The conference invites all who are interested in participating in the development of rural areas: farmers, leaders of church, civic, labor, fraternal, and business groups, educators, staff members of concerned organizations, and government personnel working in this field.

Dear Friend:

Response to our forthcoming Southern Rural Conference is mounting from those interested in providing sound economic development in Southern rural communities and in buttressing the drive for full citizenship rights for all.

Since we have not yet heard from you regarding your attendance at the conference, we are writing to remind you that its dates, November 14-16, are rapidly approaching. In case you have mislaid the conference program, we are enclosing another. We hope you will find it possible to attend and that you will send in your Registration Form as soon as possible.

You may find the enclosed report, "The South's Revolution--Challenge to the Nation," of interest for its statistical information concerning problems of the region and for its brief account of our pilot project in Fayette County. Also enclosed is a progress report to bring you abreast of current developments in this exciting and hopeful project.

I look forward to seeing you at the conference.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Miss Bennett:

As I told you over the telephone, I shall not be in attendance at the conference. Mr. Dabbs and Paul Rilling should give us excellent representation, and we are pleased to see on the program the names of Dr. Graham, Paul Christopher, and Courtney Siceloff--all SRC members, and Elbert Jeans and Alice Spearman, who work in a close relationship to our programs.

Best wishes for a most successful meeting.

Paul and I have discussed your telephone call and he will be expecting to talk further with you during the meeting.

Dear Miss Bennett:

I am sorry I did not get back to you by telephone last week, but it was a hectic time what with annual meeting and all.

Paul Christopher and Staige Blackford have, however, informed me pretty well, I think, about their conversations with you. It is an intriguing idea and I am sure an opportunity. I am also sure, as I have said to you, that we are carrying about all the load we responsibly can and, while I am mindful of your statement that the administrative and program burden would be yours, realism points out that some at least would be ours. The first problem, of course, is money and our dilemma here is, quite candidly, as follows: we are loath to undertake an additional fund-raising effort ourselves and we are, on the other hand, hesitant about authorizing anyone else to raise funds in our behalf.

What all this adds up to is that we are, if you are willing, prepared to carry on further consideration of the idea but we think that, although speed is of the essence if the program is to be meaningful, it should be deliberate speed. We think the most helpful thing would be, at this point, for you to write at some length, outlining and summarizing the ideas you have discussed with Paul and Staige. I think this would give us a basis for further discussions which I am sure would be needed. It seems to Paul and me that the proposed program ought to have a certain amount of cooperation or at least good will from the Department of Agriculture, and if you have any thoughts about that I wish you would include them in the letter.

I am sorry touask you to go to this further trouble, but this is a fairly big thing you propose and we want to give it sound thought.

With best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

Leslie W. Dunbar

Dear Miss Bennett:

We received your letter this morning. Ira Kaye had earlier written about the same matter, and by now he has our reply.

As we told him, we are working to get the report done by him and his associates in publishable shape, and intend to have it edited and mimeographed by December 10. Until that is done we do not believe that the findings can be presented, as an SRC report, to the Secretary or to the public. We told Ira that we would return to him all the raw data, which he will be free to use after our report is released.

We are sorry, therefore, that we cannot accede to your's and his request to send him to Washington. We agree fully with you on the importance of the problems--which is why we planned and commissioned the study. And we are doing all that we know how to present the data gathered by Ira and his associates as effectively as possible.

With best regards,

Sincerely yours,

AIR MAIL

Dr. Leslie W. Dunbar
Executive Director
Southern Regional Council, Inc.

Atlanta 3, Georgia

Dear Dr. Dunbar:

I think you know that while Mr. Ira Kaye was unable to attend our Southern rural conference at Bricks, North Carolina, recently, because he was called to duty as a reserve officer in the Air Force, a report on discriminatory practices of Department of Agriculture agencies in nine counties of South Carolina was presented to the conference by my husband, Rowland Watts, Special Counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union.

The report created great interest, especially among the government officials who were there. These included Assistant Secretary of Agriculture John A. Baker, who has suggested that Secretary Orville Freeman would be interested in having the report presented to him.

An appointment is now being sought with Secretary Freeman for Wednesday or Thursday, December 5th or 6th, and we feel very strongly that it will be granted. While Rowland Watts and I expect to be present at the meeting with Mr. Freeman, the conference would have greatly added value if Ira Kaye could be present also, since he knows the South Carolina situation at first hand and is the person who made the study and prepared the report. Mr. Kaye says he would be very willing to take the time to go to Washington for this conference with the Secretary of Agriculture, but that he is unable to pay his own expenses to do so, which he estimates will come to $100. The National Sharecroppers Fund finds itself at a low ebb financially because of the heavy drain upon our resources of the Bricks, North Carolina, meeting. Since the nine-county South Carolina report was prepared with the support of the Southern Regional Council as well as the South Carolina Council on Human Relations, we hope very much that you will find it possible to allocate funds from the Southern Regional Council to enable Mr. Kaye to make the trip to Washington next week.

Dear Miss Bennett:

We are sending you enclosed ten copies of the South Carolina report. Please let us know if you wish additional copies.

This represents a considerable abbreviation of the material which Ira turned in. We regret that, especially do we regret that there was not more interview material that we could use. Unfortunately, a great deal was simply not tight enough to be published.

We are giving this distribution to bureau heads and up in the Department of Agriculture, to department offices in South Carolina, to committee members in Congress, and to advisory committees to the Commission on Civil Rights in southern states. This is on top of our regular distribution to certain government agencies, human relations agencies, etc. We are not making a press release, although we are sending it, routinely, to some of the press and also to some farm publications and to some South Carolina newspapers which ordinarily do not get our stuff.

I am glad you had a good meeting with the Secretary.

Best wishes.

Dear Dr. Dunbar:

I came away from our Thursday and Friday meetings at the Department of Agriculture greatly encouraged over the prospects of action to aid Negro farmers and other disadvantaged low-income rural families in the South. Ira Kaye has probably given you a discouraging report because, unfortunately, our appointment with Secretary Freeman was postponed several times because the Secretary was tied up at the White House on budget problems. He ended up having to cancel his Thursday appointments entirely. We did work in a short meeting while Ira was there with Assistant Secretary John Baker, and Ira was able to present the most important sections of the report we wanted to make.

The rest of our meeting was carried over to Friday afternoon, and we had a satisfying meeting which included Secretary Freeman for half the time. We covered all of the points we wanted to make and were given assurances that the Department would act on our recommendations.

I feel particularly encouraged about the prospects because the National Advisory Committee on Rural Areas Development discussed our Fayette County project in some detail, and our work there was well received. A subcommittee on equal opportunity and special help to disadvantaged rural families was adopted and will work with the people in the Agriculture Department under John Baker who will be concerned with this new program.

I am looking forward to receiving a copy of the Southern Regional Council's report on the South Carolina study.

I hope to write to you again before long in reply to your letter asking for additional information in regard to our proposed joint project.

Summary of an 18 month Demonstration Project
In Developing Job Training Programs Among the "Hard-Core" Unemployed
And Underemployed in Southern Rural Areas, Under Sec. 201
Of the Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962

Project Agency. National Sharecroppers Fund is a non-profit, voluntary agency with 25 years of experience working to aid rural Southern farm people. Its primary recent emphasis has been to assist, through conferences, informational material, and a field staff, the most disadvantaged rural people in finding solutions to their economic and social problems through participation in governmental farm programs and cooperatives. Its functioning National Board includes authorities in the fields of rural sociology and adult education who will assist in the planning and execution of the project.

Characteristics and Needs of Trainees. Sharecroppers and farm workers who are being displaced by a changing economy often lack the basic education and experience needed to adjust to urban industrial life. They are rural people who, with training and planning, can find more skilled employment on the land and in small rural communities. They have had little experience with state employment offices and are not now being reached by them.

Purpose and Program of Project. The project is designed to demonstrate that unused resources of leadership within the poorer areas of the rural South, in cooperation with the smaller, predominantly Negro colleges, can effectively develop programs of job training that will enable many unemployed persons to lead economically useful lives in their own communities. During the course of 18 months, the agency expects to assist in developing at least two programs in each of the following six states: North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Tennessee. It expects that 1500-2000 trainees will participate.

By using its experience and local contacts, the agency will reach leaders and potential leaders among the rural groups who are not now being utilized in developing training programs. It will assist them and their communities to analyze their training needs in the light of existing and potential job possibilities and help them to develop a fruitful working relationship with the employment services, agricultural vocational agencies, cooperating colleges, and other state and federal agencies.

NSF will encourage the sponsorship of training programs by those colleges that are best qualified by experience to teach the inadequately prepared, but that have hitherto been restrained by lack of staff and funds from exploiting the potentials of serving in this way. It will help them to establish active relationships with the local communities that need the programs and will assist them in the preparation of these programs. It will seek to develop cooperative action for training between these colleges and larger ones that may have greater staff and facilities available.

Personnel Requirements. The project will require one Field Coordinator and three Field Representatives responsible for two states each, and appropriate secretarial-clerical assistance.

Project Agency: National Sharecroppers Fund

Executive Secretary: Fay Bennett

The National Sharecroppers Fund is a non-profit, voluntary agency with more than twenty-five years' experience in work with Southern sharecroppers, tenant farmers, and other low-income farm families. Through this work NSF has gained contacts throughout the South and has won the confidence of disadvantaged people who are hard to reach through normal governmental channels and who have often been neglected by local leadership. NSF has worked cooperatively with church leaders, educators, labor officials, and community relations leaders in the South on the basis of mutual trust and confidence.

NSF's program includes bringing low-income rural people together with concerned governmental and private agencies to find solutions to their economic and social problems. NSF's experience is in rural work, and it brings special skills to bear on the particular problems of the rural poor. It has achieved considerable success with its program.

NSF's National Board is made up of leaders in many areas of American life. Its Chairman is Dr. Frank P. Graham, former President of the University of North Carolina and U.S. Senator, and presently mediator for the United Nations. The role of NSF has been recognized by the Department of Commerce in its recent appointment of Dr. Graham as Chairman of the National Advisory Committee to the Area Redevelopment Administration, and earlier by the Department of Agriculture in the appointment of NSF's Executive Secretary, Miss Fay Bennett, to the National Advisory Committee on Rural Areas Development. Other NSF Board members with particularly pertinent background and experience who will be available for consultation and guidance during the course of this project include:

Dr. Manet Fowler, anthropologist, former Consultant in Intergroup Relations, National Board, Young Women's Christian Association

Dr. Patricia Cayo Sexton, Associate Professor of Educational Sociology, School of Education, New York University; author of Education and Income

Dr. Lewis W. Jones, sociologist, formerly of the Race Relations Department, Fisk University; author of Cold Rebellion

Dr. Frank McCallister, Director, Labor Education Division, Roosevelt University; formerly Director, Georgia Workers Education Service

Dr. Clarence Senior, Professor of Sociology, Brooklyn College; Member, Board of Education, City of New York; formerly Director, Migration Division, Department of Labor, Commonwealth of Puerto Rico

Characteristics and Needs of Trainees

The people of the proposed areas of concentration in North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Tennessee are characterized by low income, substantial and persistent unemployment and underemployment, and lack of the training and education which would enable them to break out of the cycle of poverty.

Because these are rural areas, most of the people have not been eligible for unemployment insurance, and few have had any previous contact with state employment security services. Thus the use of such services in preparing the way for training programs presents unusual difficulties. The problem of reaching these people is further complicated by the high incidence of functional illiteracy, which means that such approaches as informational governmental brochures or newspaper publicity and advertising can have only limited success. In South Carolina, for example, one out of every five adults 25 years and older is a functional illiterate. The illiteracy rate in the area proposed for the demonstration project averages about 25 per cent.

Most of these people are experienced only in farm work, and the steady decline in the number of individual farms all over the nation makes it possible to predict that most of them will be driven off the land within the next decade. Their immediate situation is critical. Unless the situation is changed, they will enter the labor market unskilled and unable to compete. The young people, in particular, find themselves with nothing to do, nowhere to go. Many have given up the hope of anything better.

The income of these workers is among the lowest in the United States. Rural workers have been consistently left behind in the general advance of wage levels both in the country as a whole and in the South. Automation has cut into the already meagre wage levels by reducing the total work year in hourly paid farm and rural jobs. Farm worker income levels in the target states to be served by this program are among the lowest in the nation. The average cash hourly earnings for farm workers in Georgia and South Carolina is $0.61; in Louisiana, $0.70, and in Mississippi and in Tennessee, $0.53.

Many such workers in these areas would thus qualify for MDTA training under the provision that persons from farm families which have yearly incomes of under $1200.00 are to be considered unemployed for the purposes of the Manpower Act. Only a very few such workers have been thus far selected for MDTA training. Out of the first 30,014 persons selected for MDTA training, only 359 have been selected from this group.

Beyond these fundamental factors of education and income there are other important impediments to the full utilization of MDTA for these workers.

1. They live in areas in which there are few or insufficient manpower and training resources.

2. They are often totally uninformed as to training and occupational opportunities.

In short, specific training proposals developed under this contract will be directed at persons who:

1. Are members of farm families which have an income of less than $1200 per year.

2. Have not completed six years of school.

3. Can be reasonably identified as likely to be forced off the land by market shifts and automation.

4. Have no marketable skills beyond simple farm methods.

5. Are rural, unemployed, non-farm workers with incomes below $2000.00 and who have had histories of chronic unemployment for an extended period.

Purpose and Program of Proposed Demonstration Project

The purpose and program of the proposed project is:

1. To implement Section 201 of the Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962, which provides that the Secretary of Labor shall "...develop policies for the adequate occupational development and maximum utilization of the skills of the Nation's workers, promote and encourage the development of broad and diversified training programs, including on-the-job training, designed to qualify for employment the many persons who cannot reasonably be expected to secure full-time employment without such training...." directly on behalf of the unemployed or underemployed persons identified above;

2. To demonstrate that a private agency, such as the National Sharecroppers Fund, with its orientation toward a specific social and occupational group together with deep working relationships with other similarly interested public and private groups, can more effectively marshall local, State and Federal Manpower resources on behalf of these persons than the MDTA program has done thus far;

3. To demonstrate that NSF's experience and contacts can reach and develop indigenous local leadership within the disadvantaged rural groups not presently being reached by the Employment Service and other agencies of State and federal government;

4. To assist this local leadership in analyzing the training needs of the rural people in their areas, to serve as liaison between them and the Agricultural Vocational Education services and educational institutions in developing specific local training programs, and to work with them in securing participation in the training programs developed;

5. To show that, with professional program assistance, the smaller colleges can successfully use their facilities and their considerable experience in working with inadequately prepared students in developing training programs geared to the needs and capabilities of the so-called "hard-core" rural unemployed and underemployed;

6. To encourage and assist other organizations such as church groups, business associations, cooperatives, trade unions, and other public and private agencies to "pool" their resources in rural areas to develop training programs for disadvantaged groups;

7. To assist such groups and agencies in making contact with professional testing, counseling, and vocational training specialists who will enable them to better deal with the unique problems of the rural poor as they relate to occupational and training problems;

8. To demonstrate that such a program can accelerate the involvement of rural and low income farm workers in MDTA and ARA to an extent not now being reached.

The specific objective will be to develop during the course of the 18 months at least two training programs in each of the selected states. It is anticipated that such programs will train 1500 persons during this period and that their demonstrated effectiveness will accelerate the development of additional programs within these states and expansion to other states.

Although all the Southern states need such programs in their rural areas, NSF believes it prudent, while approaches and techniques of project development are being refined in the field, to concentrate initially upon selected rural areas in the six states of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Tennessee. These states have been chosen because of the considerable experience that NSF has already had in working with local persons and groups there, and because of some of the preliminary work it has already done. If, after six months, progress in these six states seems to warrant it and qualified personnel are available, immediate expansion into Florida, Alabama, and Arkansas would be considered.

Approach

It is proposed that a special staff consisting of a field coordinator, three field representatives, and necessary clerical-secretarial personnel be employed. This staff would be supplemented as needed by the NSF's Executive Secretary and staff. Members of the NSF Board who are experienced in rural sociology and in adult education will be available for consultation and guidance in carrying out the program.

NSF's special staff would expect first to evaluate the experiences of others in setting up and carrying out training programs, so that it can profit by, or further test, techniques already used. For example, it would expect at an early date to consult with the administration and staff of the Virginia State College training program for hard-core unemployed workers, in order to build upon their experience. It would also review farm labor training programs which have been successful.

In addition, NSF will encourage labor organizations, county officials, chambers of commerce, trade associations, farm organizations, etc., to imaginative action for manpower development and training programs. Through these groups we propose the development of regional manpower centers at which a coordinated approach to the range of occupational problems of the "hard-core" unemployed can be developed.

The staff would then designate specific areas for concentration in eligible counties that could be serviced by an interested educational institution. Among the educational institutions which would be approached by the staff for this purpose are:

in North Carolina -	Agricultural & Technical College of North Carolina Bennett College Livingstone College North Carolina State College John C. Smith College University of North Carolina in South Carolina -	South Carolina State College Benedict College Morris College Claflin College
in Georgia -	Paine College Spellman College Morehouse College Atlanta University University of Georgia in Mississippi -	Tougaloo College Alcorn College Jackson State College Millsaps College
in Louisiana -	Grambling College Dillard University Loyola University Southern University Leland College
in Tennessee -	LeMoyne College Fisk University Lane College Vanderbilt University Tennessee A. and I. State University

It is expected that more favorable circumstances in North Carolina for cooperative work between Negro and white institutions, and for integration of other aspects of the program, will make the project in North Carolina of particular value as a stimulus in the other states.

The NSF staff will work to encourage the smaller colleges, many of which are understaffed and underfinanced, to develop such projects and will inform them of the aid and experienced assistance that is available. It will act as their liaison with the local leadership in determining what training programs are most urgently needed and in seeking out and selecting those trainees who are qualified and most in need of the training to be provided. To the extent necessary, it will assist in developing the programs and will help prepare them for presentation to the appropriate state and federal agencies involved.

While the preliminary steps are being taken with the colleges, the field staff will also seek out the established and potential leadership within the disadvantaged groups in the selected areas. Through interviews, meetings, and conferences, the field staff will present the possibilities to them and to the local community and help them to determine what training programs would be most immediately productive. At an early stage it would seek to involve the established leadership and organizational resources of the entire community in planning and developing the programs. It would particularly seek the participation of the local employment security office and vocational teachers and administrators. It would serve as liaison between these persons and groups and the participating colleges.

As the programs are developed, the field staff will render such assistance as is needed to see that they are carried successfully to completion. Throughout the project, the staff will develop a continuing working relationship with state educational and employment security agencies and with national and regional OMAT administrators, as well as with the Bureau of Employment Security and appropriate agencies of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. It will proceed as rapidly as possible to develop additional projects through other colleges and educational institutions in other areas in the selected states.

It is not possible to set forth a precise timetable for this pioneering program. It is anticipated, however, that the preliminary developmental work will be completed in about four months and that a further three months would be needed to work out the details of and secure the approval for the initial training programs. The remainder of the year would be devoted to carrying the programs forward and in developing new programs. It is hoped that after the first one is launched the others will develop with accelerating momentum.

Personnel Requirements

Field Coordinator. The Field Coordinator will be responsible for the overall organization, scope, pace, and functioning of the projects in all six states, and will provide overall supervision of staff and liaison with appropriate governmental agencies. He will be responsible for the actual execution in the field of the program in the six designated states. He will be based at the regional headquarters, probably in North Carolina. He will direct and supervise the work of the field representatives and will be available to assist them as needed in negotiation with community leaders and with educational, state, and local officials. He will decide what criteria and methods will shape the demonstration project and prepare a report at its conclusion.

Three Field Representatives. Each field representative will be primarily responsible for carrying out the project in two states and will have his base in one of them. His assignment will be flexible, however, and he may be called upon to assist another field representative temporarily if the progress of the overall project so requires. It may be desirable for all of the representatives to work initially with the coordinator in one state to develop and test their techniques.

Dear Miss Bennett:

I understand that Paul Anthony and you have talked about the proposal to aid low income, rural families. We think it is an attractive idea. But I'm afraid we ought not, at this time, to try to tackle it on a region-wide basis. It would seem to me that everyone concerned would be in a stronger position to plan ahead after the South Carolina program, which you and Alice have going, can be better evaluated.

Part of my reason for saying that is that we think the state Councils on Human Relations would be better situated than are we to render effective program cooperation with you. The state councils, as you probably know, are affiliated with us, but each is an autonomous agency, and with one exception, tax exempt. There is a council now in every state that you note in your memorandum as a state in which you would like to plan program except Louisiana. The Mississippi council is pretty young and not yet blessed with tax exemption.

What we would suggest, therefore, is that after an interval of experience in South Carolina, the program be discussed with one or two of the other state councils and if they would like to take it on, we would work with them and with you in trying to make that feasible. The groups being, as I said, autonomous, we of course cannot predict how any of them might respond to the idea.

I was in New York a few weeks ago for a short stay and a very tight schedule, and had the pleasure of meeting, for the first time, your husband. Sooner or later I hope to meet the whole family.

With best regards,

Sincerely yours,

Leslie W. Dunbar

Dear Dr. Dunbar:

I am chagrined to find that so much time has elapsed since I received your letter of November 27 asking me to present in writing a summary of the ideas I have discussed with Paul Rilling, Staige Blackford, Paul Christopher, and James Dabbs. The fact is that I have been out of the office a good deal lately and have been rather swamped with several reports and pamphlets which are under preparation, as well as our Board meeting which takes place early in February.

In order not to delay any further, I am enclosing a brief statement of the proposal we have in mind, with several attachments, in further explanation of our planned work in the rural South. I hope this will be sufficient to start the ball rolling as a basis for discussions in the Southern Regional Council. I will be glad to supply any additional information as questions arise.

You will be interested to know that in the meantime Dr. Graham and I have had a useful meeting with Henry Saltzman of the Ford Foundation's Public Affairs Program staff. The meeting was at the request of Mr. Saltzman, who wanted to talk about how the Ford Foundation might contribute to strengthening American life in rural areas, now that they have participated successfully in a number of urban-oriented studies and projects. I am sending Mr. Saltzman a copy of the enclosed memorandum for his information and hope that the Ford Foundation may be interested in further discussions on this subject, and it may be that they will be interested in financing the program we have in mind.

I hope you will let me know if the enclosed memorandum meets your needs in discussing the proposed project in SRC. We are pleased that already we are engaged in a cooperative effort on field staff with the South Carolina Council on Human Relations. This is referred to in the enclosed statement.

Sincerely yours,

Fay Bennett

PROPOSAL TO AID LOW-INCOME RURAL FAMILIES
IN BACKWARD SOUTHERN AREAS AND TO STIMULATE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT IN THE RURAL SOUTH

There are an increasing number of government programs designed to aid low-income rural families. Some of the older ones, such as Farmers Home Administration loans, have recently been expanded and liberalized. There are new categories of rural housing loans available; federal funds are available for rural training programs; Area Redevelopment Administration funds are available to improve rural community facilities and to attract industry to rural areas to provide much-needed jobs.

Yet traditional patterns of exclusion and discrimination often prevent low-income farmers, particularly Negroes, from taking part in these programs. That government agencies are responsive and will provide aid when the groundwork is laid in a local community is shown by a National Sharecroppers Fund pilot project in Fayette County, Tennessee. Attachment #1 is a progress report summarizing the steps taken to help a local group by-pass the uncooperative local power structure and qualify for technical and financial federal assistance.

The need now is to accelerate this program of providing information, guidance, and organizing help to local groups of low-income farm families, to enable them to take advantage of these federal aid programs before they are dispossessed of their land and homes. This need is particularly acute in areas where traditional patterns of Negro subservience are changing through voter registration drives. Negroes in these areas need help immediately to prevent reprisal foreclosure of farms and loss of equipment and livestock, to ensure distribution of needed federal surplus food, and to stimulate planning for a viable future.

To provide this help, the National Sharecroppers Fund proposes to enlarge its field staff to include a field representative in each of the following states: Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Georgia, South Carolina,[1] North Carolina, and Virginia. These field people would carry on programs similar to those we have conducted on a pilot basis in Fayette County, Tennessee. See Attachment #3 where marked "One Year's Experience."

That agencies of the federal government would view such an expansion of our program with satisfaction can be deduced from the close cooperation we have received from these agencies in our work in Fayette County. U.S. Department of Agriculture officials concerned with rural areas development are particularly sensitive to the discriminatory practices in Southern states which have prevented their programs from being fully available to Negroes. They are well aware of the brake this applies to the whole economy, of the compounded difficulties of unskilled, uneducated Negroes migrating to industrial centers, and of the growing blight upon the rural areas of continued Negro poverty and exclusion from the richness of American life.

The membership of the executive secretary of the National Sharecroppers Fund on the National Advisory Committee on Rural Areas Development, set up

[1]The National Sharecroppers Fund and the South Carolina Council on Human Relations have already agreed to co-sponsor Mr. L. S. James as a field secretary for rural economic and social development in South Carolina. Both groups will share equal responsibility for Mr. James' salary and expenses. Mr. James is already at work on this program with primary emphasis on building grass-roots attendance at the coming South Carolina conference to be held February 13-15 at Penn Community Center. State and federal officials as well as church and lay leaders and farmers will participate. Attachment #2 gives the program of a conference held at Bricks, North Carolina, last fall, which has provided the stimulus for similar conferences in other Southern states and for more interest and action in this area of unmet need.

to advise Secretary Orville Freeman and the U.S. Department of Agriculture, further attests to the channels of communication which are established and to the desire of the USDA leadership to find ways of making their programs more effective. While the National Advisory Committee on Rural Areas Development is made up primarily of farm leaders from various parts of the country, it also includes Dr. Henry McCanna, Executive Director of the Church in Town and Country, National Council of Churches; Rev. Edward W. O'Rourke, Executive Director of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference; Frank Fernbach, Economist of the Research Department, AFL-CIO; and Elizabeth Herring, Executive Secretary of the National Council on Agricultural Life and Labor. The National Sharecroppers Fund maintains cordial relations with all of these groups in cooperative efforts to help disadvantaged rural families.

Other evidence of USDA's cooperation is shown by the December, 1962, meeting with Secretary Freeman and National Sharecroppers Fund representatives on establishment of a new committee on equal opportunity with an inter-racial staff charged with responsibility for finding ways of making USDA's programs available to all who need them, regardless of race.

Non-governmental agency work is needed to stimulate interest and action on the local level to make these programs work. As high officials of USDA have reiterated: democratic government is responsive, not coercive.

Progress Report
on
National Sharecroppers Fund
Tennessee Program
October, 1962

The pilot project of the National Sharecroppers Fund to assist displaced rural families in Fayette and Haywood Counties, Tennessee, to become economically self-sufficient is approaching successful completion. Many of these sharecroppers and tenant farmers, most of them Negroes, were dispossessed for registering to vote. Many are also unemployed and underemployed because of the technological revolution in agriculture. Instead of a bare existence in tents or sharecropper shacks, or the prospect of out-migration to metropolitan slums, they can now look forward to finding jobs in an industry which their efforts will help bring to their own community. Along with jobs and a secure income will come better health, education, and cultural advantages which make for a better life.

On October 5, 1962, over 250 Fayette County residents crowded the Mt. Olive Baptist Church in Somerville, Tennessee, to launch the West Tennessee Development Company's drive for local capital to establish a $550,000 factory. This factory will employ about 200 workers, most of whom would be the dispossessed and unemployed farm workers in the local area. The Development Company was organized by a local bi-racial committee after a year's effort by Allen Yancey, Jr., NSF field representative. As required by the Rural Areas Development program and the Area Redevelopment Administration's rules, the committee is broadly representative of community interests, including farmers and businessmen from rural Somerville, and a union leader, an educator, and a bank official from nearby Memphis.

The plant, which will be constructed and operated by the Diamond Plating Company of Memphis, was selected in close consultation with U.S. Department of Agriculture and Department of Commerce representatives after federal experts assisted in analyzing the local needs and resources. Agriculture's Rural Electrification Administration expert John H. Myhre made numerous visits to Fayette County to provide technical help to the group. The Area Redevelopment Administration's specialist on community organization, George H. Robinson, gave much valuable assistance.

The project, which calls for a federal loan for 65% of the cost (approximately $360,000), has been approved by the Fayette County Area Redevelopment Administration Committee and the State of Tennessee. A further 25% will be supplied by the metal plating company and private financing. The remaining 10% will be raised by the local development company through the sale of stock at $5.00 a share, and through interest-bearing loans and contributions which may be obtained from outside the area. Full control will be retained locally.

The October 5th meeting heard ARA officials and Dr. Lewis W. Jones of Fisk University explain and praise the results to date and encourage strong local support. The enthusiastic response of those present was that the local money would be raised. Fay Bennett assured the group of the continued assistance of the National Sharecroppers Fund.

We hope that our next report can announce that this money has been raised and that the factory is under way. The experience gained by NSF in helping to conceive and develop this project, and in guiding it through the intricacies of federal regulations and around the roadblocks of local power opposition, can now be drawn upon to help other rural communities find viable solutions to the ever-mounting problem of farm worker displacement. A full report of steps taken to achieve this progress is being prepared and will be used to stimulate other local groups to initiate similar projects.

NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND

November 14-16, 1962
Franklinton Center
Bricks, North Carolina

WHY THIS CONFERENCE?

In the past decade over four million rural Southerners have been uprooted from their homes. The continuing decline of opportunities in small scale farming and the lack of alternative employment in rural areas have forced many families off the land without the means to better their lives elsewhere. This conference is called to discuss what practical steps rural families can take to remain in farming, to obtain other employment near their homes, or to gain skills necessary to secure permanent jobs elsewhere.

WHO MAY ATTEND?

The conference invites all who wish to participate in rural development: farmers, educators, members of church, civic, labor, fraternal, and business groups, staff members of concerned organizations, and government personnel.

WHAT IS THE NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND?

The National Sharecroppers Fund is a non-profit, voluntary organization which has worked for over twenty years to bring economic and social justice to Southern sharecroppers, tenant farmers, and other low-income farm families. NSF also cooperates with other groups to improve conditions for all American farm workers, including seasonal and migratory farm laborers and their families.

MEMO to conference participants

Franklinton Center, at Bricks, North Carolina, is sponsored by the United Church of Christ. Located in the heart of eastern North Carolina's cotton farming area, with over half of the neighboring population composed of rural families, it provides an appropriate setting for this conference.

HOW TO REACH FRANKLINTON CENTER:

by car: Bricks is located on U. S. Highway 301, 16 miles north of Rocky Mount, N. C., and 3 miles south of Enfield. The nearest major city is Raleigh, 80 miles to the west.

by bus: Trailways Bus System serves Bricks, stopping at the gate of Franklinton Center.

by train: Atlantic Coastline serves Rocky Mount, from which bus connections can be made to Bricks.

by air: Piedmont Airlines serves Rocky Mount.

NOTE: Conference participants can be met at Rocky Mount for a charge of $2.00. Those wishing to be met at Raleigh-Durham will be charged $10.00 for transportation. These costs will be reduced if rides are shared. Please indicate on the Registration Form your mode of transportation and expected time of arrival.

Costs: Registration is $2.00, and $13.00 will cover room and board for the duration of the Conference (Tuesday night through Friday morning, with three meals Wednesday and Thursday, and Friday breakfast). For those not requiring full room and board, modest per diem rates will be available. Supper Tuesday night and lunch on Friday will be available for an additional nominal fee.

Financial Assistance: To the extent that resources permit, the National Sharecroppers Fund will attempt to assist persons who could not otherwise attend. Please write for information concerning such assistance, telling of your interest in attending the conference and the extent of financial need.

Accommodations: Franklinton Center has modern dormitory accommodations (no more than 4 persons to a room). The dining room serves all meals cafeteria style. Main sessions of the conference will be held in the auditorium. Smaller group discussions will be held in conference rooms. A spacious campus offers many recreational facilities, including volley ball, badminton, and ping pong.

Registration: The enclosed Registration Form should be completed and sent to the National Sharecroppers Fund together with the registration fee of $2.00 as soon as possible, since accommodations are limited. Room assignments will be made upon arrival at Franklinton Center.

THE SOUTH'S REVOLUTION
CHALLENGE to the NATION

THE economic and political revolution in the South is developing with ever-increasing speed. This continuing revolution against the old plantation economy and social system has directly affected millions of families in the South, and has indirectly affected the entire nation. It has its roots in the changing pattern of Southern agriculture, where technology and the accompanying heavy capital requirements for mechanization and land consolidation are breaking down the traditional economic and social pattern of small-scale farming and tenancy. The revolution has enabled fewer farmers to produce more food and fiber, causing one of the greatest dislocations and migrations of our country's history, swelling the stream of migrant farm workers, and bringing an influx of unskilled workers into the cities of both North and South. But the people most affected by this revolution—Negro and white farm families at the lowest economic level—may now have an opportunity of realizing the benefits which technological progress and government programs can bring.

The contrast between the situation of 25 years ago and that of today shows some of the results of this revolution:

- In 1935 there were over 3.4 million farmers in the South. Since then, 1.8 million —more than half—have left the land, one-third of them in the last five years alone.
- Of the 1.6 million farmers remaining, 88 per cent earn less than $2500 a year.
- In 1935 there were 720,000 sharecroppers and tenant farmers. Today only one-sixth—120,000—remain to eke out a marginal existence on land owned by someone else.

The fact is clear: the agricultural revolution has forced millions of farm families off the land.

Although all low-income groups have suffered, the group traditionally most deprived by the old plantation system—sharecroppers and tenant farmers, and particularly those who are Negroes—are at the greatest disadvantage in seeking a viable way of life. The extent of their dislocation is especially disturbing:

- More than half of all teenage Negroes living in Mississippi in 1950 had left the state by 1960.
- The equivalent of one-third of Mississippi's Negro population left during the 1950's, as did one quarter of Alabama's and South Carolina's, and one-fifth of Georgia's and North Carolina's.

In all, over four million persons left the rural South between 1950 and 1960. Some of these displaced persons have gone to Southern cities or joined the stream of migrant workers. But more than a million and a half Negroes—the largest Negro migration in American history—and over a million whites have sought work in Northern industrial cities. These newcomers to our urban areas come unprepared to compete for jobs in an economy that increasingly places a premium on education and developed skills. Their resources are limited because:

- One half of all adult citizens—Negro and white—of North and South Carolina, Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama received no more than an elementary school education.
- One-quarter of all American Negroes are functionally illiterate—i.e., without a fifth grade education.

The deteriorating slum cores of our industrial cities and the high unemployment and crime rates, especially among the young, all attest to the present failure of our industrial economy to meet the challenge posed by the agricultural revolution. In 1961, more than one-third of all Negroes in northern industrial cities were unemployed during some part of the year.

Three generations of a sharecropper family forced off the land in Fayette County, Tennessee.

THE OUTLOOK

Dislocation, lack of alternative employment, and unemployment take their toll in poverty and human suffering. Furthermore, for today's movements to achieve equal educational and economic opportunities and political rights to be successful, they must be built on a sound economic base. The evictions of Negro sharecroppers in Fayette and Haywood Counties, Tennessee, and other economic reprisals have shown that it is not enough for previously disenfranchised citizens to register to vote; if newly registered voters can then be forced to leave their jobs and homes by economic pressure, their hard-won right to vote will not be exercised where it counts most.

All of these problems must be met where they begin: in the declining rural areas of the South, wherever remaining low-income farm families are struggling to stay on the land or to find employment near their homes. The National Sharecroppers Fund believes that the federal government programs such as Area Redevelopment, Rural Areas Development, retaining, Farmers' Home loans, and farm workers' housing loans can make important contributions to these pressing needs of the rural South.

Thus far, however, two basic obstacles have impaired the effectiveness of these federal programs:

- Many low-income farm families lack knowledge of the programs. They often are not informed of the benefits for which they are eligible.
- The programs are locally administered, often by community leaders who are not sympathetic to the needs of low-income farm families, especially if they are Negro.

These obstacles are especially serious because these programs require all applications for industrial development loans to be made through "local initiative." Local approval is also required for farm ownership and operating loans. If low-income rural groups are excluded from participation, they will not benefit from the programs according to their needs. (There are cases of local approval being denied to those who have registered to vote.)

Fayette County's bi-racial development committee, formed by NSF's Representative (seated, right).

ONE YEAR'S EXPERIENCE

The National Sharecroppers Fund has worked during the past year on a pilot project in Fayette and Haywood Counties, Tennessee, to determine whether these obstacles can be overcome by local groups working to secure federal aid. We can report the following accomplishments during this time:

- Long months of careful groundwork have led to the formation of a bi-racial economic development company in Fayette County. Federal technicians have provided help to determine the most suitable type of industry that could be established with federal financial aid.
- A metal-plating plant, with potential year-round, full-time employment of 200, is expected to be the first industry in Fayette County to provide alternative employment for the displaced sharecroppers.
- NSF's program has introduced hundreds of low-income farmers to FHA loans, educational loans, and retraining projects.
- Many loan applications previously denied to local Negroes have been appealed to the appropriate federal agencies in Washington with the aid of NSF, with favorable results in qualified cases.
- An investigation of the Fayette County local FHA office has resulted in more careful handling of loan applications.
- A special FHA office was opened in Haywood County and received 100 loan applications in its first week of operation.
- After local requests, backed by NSF, were made, the Department of Agriculture overrode claims by local welfare officials that surplus food was not needed, and 4,000 persons in the two counties have received this food.

Such progress, gratifying as it is, must now be accelerated and repeated in other areas of the South.

A PROGRAM

Because of the traditional exclusion of Negroes, small farmers, and labor representatives from local politics in the rural South, there is a shortage of the trained leadership which is needed in depressed rural areas to insure that low-income families will receive the full benefits of federal programs. NSF's experience in its Fayette-Haywood pilot project indicates that many rural families, excluded until now from federal programs, need help in learning practical methods of applying for and receiving aid. On the other hand, our experience clearly shows that with knowledge and perseverence, local people can make substantial progress toward effective and democratic rural development.

The NSF Board of Directors has approved two major projects to expand its program in the rural South. NSF's goal is to increase participation by low-income rural families in all federal programs that can aid them, as well as to develop self-help projects.

Toward these ends:

- NSF will sponsor a meeting of rural people and potential leaders from many areas of the South at Franklinton Center, Bricks, North Carolina, on November 14-16, 1962. Government officials, educators, and personnel from private organizations, churches, and unions will also attend.
- NSF hopes to expand its Southern field staff considerably. These field representatives would work to aid low-income rural families in promoting economic and social development of their areas. (This program is dependent upon raising the necessary funds.)

The National Sharecroppers Fund has worked for over twenty years to bring economic and social justice to Southern sharecroppers and other deprived farm families. NSF also cooperates with other groups to improve conditions for all American farm workers, with special attention to the needs of disadvantaged seasonal and migratory farm workers and their families.

Dear Dr. Dunbar:

I appreciate your letter of February 27 expressing the reluctance of the Southern Regional Council to approach our proposal to aid low-income rural families on a region-wide basis. I agree that it would simplify matters and make for a stronger program to work with individual states as our resources and contacts develop. We agree that we have worked out a good relationship with the South Carolina Council on Human Relations in sharing the services of Mr. L. S. James and in our work in that state.

You will be interested to know that I have been invited by Dr. A. D. Beittel to attend a meeting of the executive committee of the Mississippi Council on Human Relations at Tougaloo next Monday, and I plan to attend. Since I shall be in the state, I am planning to spend several days talking to people about our program and about possible federal training programs for low-income farm people and other possible economic programs to help them.

I hope you will keep me in mind when you plan to visit New York, and hope that there will be time for us to get together. Rowland told me he met you when you were here for a meeting at the ACLU, but that you were indeed on a tight schedule.

Dear Staige:

Apparently I am not on your mailing list for we have not yet received a copy of the report "Federal Programs to Promote Employment and Development in Rural Communities" which grew out of the Penn Center conference in February of this year. I would be grateful if you would send us several copies of the report and add our name to your mailing list.

Perhaps you have heard about the forthcoming conference to be held again at Penn Center from September 22nd through 27th, and to be jointly sponsored by the National Sharecroppers Fund and the South Carolina Council on Human Relations. This conference will deal primarily with all phases of cooperatives * as they apply to low income farmers. We have lined up an excellent program and outstanding leadership made up of resource people from government and private agencies dealing with all aspects of cooperatives and credit unions. I hope you will make note of the dates and pass the word around to people who will be working with rural and farm groups. As soon as the conference programs are ready I will certainly see that you get some.

The Honorable Lyndon B. Johnson
The White House
Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. President:

The Board of the National Sharecroppers Fund at its meeting on December 18, 1963, noted with approval a report in the Wall Street Journal that you are considering highlighting in your 1964 legislative program the "waging of war" against domestic poverty and ignorance. Our Board instructed me to convey to you our fervent hope that you will present this concern in your State of the Union Message to the Congress in January, and to set forth to you some of the aspects of the problem that are within the area of our particular concern.

The pockets of poverty in the rural Southeast are expanding at a rapid pace due to the shifting pattern of farming and agricultural technology. The persons who are being displaced are, because of centuries of educational deprivation and gross discrimination and neglect, even less equipped to cope with technological "displacement" than their industrial brothers in the urban North.

We particularly commend to your attention the article, "The Invisible Americans," in the December 21-28 issue of The Saturday Evening Post. This on-the-spot study dramatically illustrates the consequences of rural poverty on the lives and hopes of the families affected. Many of these families are somehow subsisting on a few hundred dollars a year.

Despite substantial progress in Southern industrialization, it has had little if any effect in alleviating rural poverty. Factories cannot be located where there is neither a market for their products nor adequate transportation facilities to bring the products to a market. They cannot be located where there is no water supply, no sewage disposal, no health or recreational facilities, and grossly inadequate public schooling. What is needed first--and now--is a vast new federal program of rural development of secondary roads for access to markets, water supply and sewage disposal, health clinics and rural schools, and decent housing to meet human needs and make industrial development possible. This program is urgently needed to give the rural areas the stimulus they need to advance economically and socially, and to create the markets that make factory location through Area Redevelopment and Rural Areas Development economically feasible. Such a program would indeed prime the pump of the rural economy and do much to relieve the mounting pressure upon the urban economy from the influx of the poorly educated, unskilled rural unemployed.

The problem is particularly acute for older rural persons who have spent most of their productive lives in agricultural work for which they are no longer needed. Many of these people, despite accumulating debt, have up to now been able to cling to their rural homes and their few acres of land. They cannot hold out much longer. It is both inhumane and uneconomic to force them to spend their declining years on welfare in a city slum. With an adequate federal program now, no senior citizen need fear so bleak a future. An imaginative program of grants-in-aid would give them the supplemental income they need to pay their debts and carry on a modified homesteading operation. If outright grants are deemed inadvisable, a part-time public works program such as WPA should be inaugurated to enable them to contribute to the physical improvement of the countryside while they live in dignity under their own roofs.

Rural youth, too, are in particular and urgent need of immediate help, for most of them will have to find their future off the farm. A large-scale training program is needed which will combine basic remedial education and realistic vocational training in present-day marketable skills with sufficient remuneration to provide both subsistence for the trainee and some assistance for the family at home--as was done in the Civilian Conservation Corps. It should lead into on-the-job training and employment in the larger federal development program and the expanding industries the latter program will encourage.

The National Sharecroppers Fund heartily endorses the other proposals suggested in the Wall Street Journal article. We have long advocated the elementary justice of minimum-wage coverage for farm workers, federal assistance for the education of migrant children, federal assistance to all needy dependent children, expansion of the food stamp plan and other programs for the distribution of food to the needy, and bringing to farm workers the protection of social legislation that most other workers have long enjoyed. These are all necessary but more is obviously needed now. That more is the public works, aid for the rural aging, and training of rural youth that we here urge upon you.

Sincerely yours,

/S/ Fay Bennett

Dear Les:

We are working on the memorandum you asked for concerning the possibility of SRC contracting with NSF to work in the rural areas of some of the Southern states as we are doing in South Carolina so effectively. We are also preparing a brief report on our past year's work in South Carolina in cooperation with the South Carolina Council on Human Relations. I hope to have both of these papers in your hands next week.

President Johnson's poverty message has now gone to the Congress and we are busily lining up expert witnesses as well as the poor themselves from rural areas to testify to the need. His recommendations don't go far enough, but they would be a giant step in the right direction. I am enclosing a copy of our letter to the President on this subject and you will note on page 2 that ~~one~~ some of our recommendations ~~was~~ were included in the poverty legislation. I think you will be interested in the whole letter because it indicates the kind of things our field people will be working on. The Administration's poverty legislation will lean heavily on local initiative, as have other federal programs, and this is where our field work is essential to bring the message to those who need these programs, to develop local leadership, and to help local people organize to receive the aid they need.

Also enclosed is the seven page summary of our OMAT project proposal which gives some detail of what is involved, what the needs are, and how our staff will seek to meet them.

I read Claude Sitton's account of the Southern Regional Council's annual report and quotes from you which appeared in the New York Times a few days ago. Will you please send me a copy of your report. I'd also appreciate getting all the reports you issue, including your newsletter to state Councils.

I'm so glad we had an opportunity to meet in Atlanta and to have a good talk about our mutual concerns.

Sincerely,

Fay

Summary of an 18 month Demonstration Project
In Developing Job Training Programs Among the "Hard-Core" Unemployed
And Underemployed in Southern Rural Areas, Under Sec. 201
Of the Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962

Project Agency. National Sharecroppers Fund is a non-profit, voluntary agency with 25 years of experience working to aid rural Southern farm people. Its primary recent emphasis has been to assist, through conferences, informational material, and a field staff, the most disadvantaged rural people in finding solutions to their economic and social problems through participation in governmental farm programs and cooperatives. Its functioning National Board includes authorities in the fields of rural sociology and adult education who will assist in the planning and execution of the project.

Characteristics and Needs of Trainees. Sharecroppers and farm workers who are being displaced by a changing economy often lack the basic education and experience needed to adjust to urban industrial life. They are rural people who, with training and planning, can find more skilled employment on the land and in small rural communities. They have had little experience with state employment offices and are not now being reached by them.

Purpose and Program of Project. The project is designed to demonstrate that unused resources of leadership within the poorer areas of the rural South, in cooperation with the smaller, predominantly Negro colleges, can effectively develop programs of job training that will enable many unemployed persons to lead economically useful lives in their own communities. During the course of 18 months, the agency expects to assist in developing at least two programs in each of the following six states: North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Tennessee. It expects that 1500-2000 trainees will participate.

By using its experience and local contacts, the agency will reach leaders and potential leaders among the rural groups who are not now being utilized in developing training programs. It will assist them and their communities to analyze their training needs in the light of existing and potential job possibilities and help them to develop a fruitful working relationship with the employment services, agricultural vocational agencies, cooperating colleges, and other state and federal agencies.

NSF will encourage the sponsorship of training programs by those colleges that are best qualified by experience to teach the inadequately prepared, but that have hitherto been restrained by lack of staff and funds from exploiting the potentials of serving in this way. It will help them to establish active relationships with the local communities that need the programs and will assist them in the preparation of these programs. It will seek to develop cooperative action for training between these colleges and larger ones that may have greater staff and facilities available.

Personnel Requirements. The project will require one Field Coordinator and three Field Representatives responsible for two states each, and appropriate secretarial-clerical assistance.

Project Agency: National Sharecroppers Fund
112 East 19th Street
New York 3, New York
GR 3-0284

Executive Secretary: Fay Bennett

The National Sharecroppers Fund is a non-profit, voluntary agency with more than twenty-five years' experience in work with Southern sharecroppers, tenant farmers, and other low-income farm families. Through this work NSF has gained contacts throughout the South and has won the confidence of disadvantaged people who are hard to reach through normal governmental channels and who have often been neglected by local leadership. NSF has worked cooperatively with church leaders, educators, labor officials, and community relations leaders in the South on the basis of mutual trust and confidence.

NSF's program includes bringing low-income rural people together with concerned governmental and private agencies to find solutions to their economic and social problems. NSF's experience is in rural work, and it brings special skills to bear on the particular problems of the rural poor. It has achieved considerable success with its program.

NSF's National Board is made up of leaders in many areas of American life. Its Chairman is Dr. Frank P. Graham, former President of the University of North Carolina and U.S. Senator, and presently mediator for the United Nations. The role of NSF has been recognized by the Department of Commerce in its recent appointment of Dr. Graham as Chairman of the National Advisory Committee to the Area Redevelopment Administration, and earlier by the Department of Agriculture in the appointment of NSF's Executive Secretary, Miss Fay Bennett, to the National Advisory Committee on Rural Areas Development. Other NSF Board members with particularly pertinent background and experience who will be available for consultation and guidance during the course of this project include:

Dr. Manet Fowler, anthropologist, former Consultant in Intergroup Relations, National Board, Young Women's Christian Association

Dr. Patricia Cayo Sexton, Associate Professor of Educational Sociology, School of Education, New York University; author of Education and Income

Dr. Lewis W. Jones, sociologist, formerly of the Race Relations Department, Fisk University; author of Cold Rebellion

Dr. Frank McCallister, Director, Labor Education Division, Roosevelt University; formerly Director, Georgia Workers Education Service

Dr. Clarence Senior, Professor of Sociology, Brooklyn College; Member, Board of Education, City of New York; formerly Director, Migration Division, Department of Labor, Commonwealth of Puerto Rico

Dr. Ira DeA. Reid, Professor of Sociology, Haverford College; author of The Negro Youth: Their Social and Economic Background and numerous other writings on Negro sociology and education

Dr. Robert B. Johnson, Assistant Professor of Social Work, New York University

Characteristics and Needs of Trainees

The people of the proposed areas of concentration in North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Tennessee are characterized by low income, substantial and persistent unemployment and underemployment, and lack of the training and education which would enable them to break out of the cycle of poverty.

Because these are rural areas, most of the people have not been eligible for unemployment insurance, and few have had any previous contact with state employment security services. Thus the use of such services in preparing the way for training programs presents unusual difficulties. The problem of reaching these people is further complicated by the high incidence of functional illiteracy, which means that such approaches as informational governmental brochures or newspaper publicity and advertising can have only limited success. In South Carolina, for example, one out of every five adults 25 years and older is a functional illiterate. The illiteracy rate in the area proposed for the demonstration project averages about 25 per cent.

Most of these people are experienced only in farm work, and the steady decline in the number of individual farms all over the nation makes it possible to predict that most of them will be driven off the land within the next decade. Their immediate situation is critical. Unless the situation is changed, they will enter the labor market unskilled and unable to compete. The young people, in particular, find themselves with nothing to do, nowhere to go. Many have given up the hope of anything better.

The income of these workers is among the lowest in the United States. Rural workers have been consistently left behind in the general advance of wage levels both in the country as a whole and in the South. Automation has cut into the already meagre wage levels by reducing the total work year in hourly paid farm and rural jobs. Farm worker income levels in the target states to be served by this program are among the lowest in the nation. The average cash hourly earnings for farm workers in Georgia and South Carolina is $0.61; in Louisiana, $0.70, and in Mississippi and in Tennessee, $0.53.

Many such workers in these areas would thus qualify for MDTA training under the provision that persons from farm families which have yearly incomes of under $1200.00 are to be considered unemployed for the purposes of the Manpower Act. Only a very few such workers have been thus far selected for MDTA training. Out of the first 30,014 persons selected for MDTA training, only 359 have been selected from this group.

Beyond these fundamental factors of education and income there are other important impediments to the full utilization of MDTA for these workers.

1. They live in areas in which there are few or insufficient manpower and training resources.

2. They are often totally uninformed as to training and occupational opportunities.

In short, specific training proposals developed under this contract will be directed at persons who:

1. Are members of farm families which have an income of less than $1200 per year.

2. Have not completed six years of school.

3. Can be reasonably identified as likely to be forced off the land by market shifts and automation.

4. Have no marketable skills beyond simple farm methods.

5. Are rural, unemployed, non-farm workers with incomes below $2000.00 and who have had histories of chronic unemployment for an extended period.

Purpose and Program of Proposed Demonstration Project

The purpose and program of the proposed project is:

1. To implement Section 201 of the Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962, which provides that the Secretary of Labor shall "...develop policies for the adequate occupational development and maximum utilization of the skills of the Nation's workers, promote and encourage the development of broad and diversified training programs, including on-the-job training, designed to qualify for employment the many persons who cannot reasonably be expected to secure full-time employment without such training...." directly on behalf of the unemployed or underemployed persons identified above;

2. To demonstrate that a private agency, such as the National Sharecroppers Fund, with its orientation toward a specific social and occupational group together with deep working relationships with other similarly interested public and private groups, can more effectively marshall local, State and Federal Manpower resources on behalf of these persons than the MDTA program has done thus far;

3. To demonstrate that NSF's experience and contacts can reach and develop indigenous local leadership within the disadvantaged rural groups not presently being reached by the Employment Service and other agencies of State and federal government;

4. To assist this local leadership in analyzing the training needs of the rural people in their areas, to serve as liaison between them and the Agricultural Vocational Education services and educational institutions in developing specific local training programs, and to work with them in securing participation in the training programs developed;

5. To show that, with professional program assistance, the smaller colleges can successfully use their facilities and their considerable experience in working with inadequately prepared students in developing training programs geared to the needs and capabilities of the so-called "hard-core" rural unemployed and underemployed;

6. To encourage and assist other organizations such as church groups, business associations, cooperatives, trade unions, and other public and private agencies to "pool" their resources in rural areas to develop training programs for disadvantaged groups;

7. To assist such groups and agencies in making contact with professional testing, counseling, and vocational training specialists who will enable them to better deal with the unique problems of the rural poor as they relate to occupational and training problems;

8. To demonstrate that such a program can accelerate the involvement of rural and low income farm workers in MDTA and ARA to an extent not now being reached.

The specific objective will be to develop during the course of the 18 months at least two training programs in each of the selected states. It is anticipated that such programs will train 1500 persons during this period and that their demonstrated effectiveness will accelerate the development of additional programs within these states and expansion to other states.

Although all the Southern states need such programs in their rural areas, NSF believes it prudent, while approaches and techniques of project development are being refined in the field, to concentrate initially upon selected rural areas in the six states of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Tennessee. These states have been chosen because of the considerable experience that NSF has already had in working with local persons and groups there, and because of some of the preliminary work it has already done. If, after six months, progress in these six states seems to warrant it and qualified personnel are available, immediate expansion into Florida, Alabama, and Arkansas would be considered.

Approach

It is proposed that a special staff consisting of a field coordinator, three field representatives, and necessary clerical-secretarial personnel be employed. This staff would be supplemented as needed by the NSF's Executive Secretary and staff. Members of the NSF Board who are experienced in rural sociology and in adult education will be available for consultation and guidance in carrying out the program.

NSF's special staff would expect first to evaluate the experiences of others in setting up and carrying out training programs, so that it can profit by, or further test, techniques already used. For example, it would expect at an early date to consult with the administration and staff of the Virginia State College training program for hard-core unemployed workers, in order to build upon their experience. It would also review farm labor training programs which have been successful.

In addition, NSF will encourage labor organizations, county officials, chambers of commerce, trade associations, farm organizations, etc., to imaginative action for manpower development and training programs. Through these groups we propose the development of regional manpower centers at which a coordinated approach to the range of occupational problems of the "hard-core" unemployed can be developed.

The staff would then designate specific areas for concentration in eligible counties that could be serviced by an interested educational institution. Among the educational institutions which would be approached by the staff for this purpose are:

in North Carolina - Agricultural & Technical College of North Carolina Bennett College
Livingstone College
North Carolina State College
John C. Smith College University of North Carolina in South Carolina - South Carolina State College

Benedict College
Morris College
Claflin College

in Georgia - Paine College
Spellman College
Morehouse College
Atlanta University
University of Georgia in Mississippi - Tougaloo College

Alcorn College
Jackson State College
Millsaps College

in Louisiana - Grambling College
Dillard University
Loyola University
Southern University
Leland College

in Tennessee - LeMoyne College
Fisk University
Lane College
Vanderbilt University
Tennessee A. and I. State University

It is expected that more favorable circumstances in North Carolina for cooperative work between Negro and white institutions, and for integration of other aspects of the program, will make the project in North Carolina of particular value as a stimulus in the other states.

The NSF staff will work to encourage the smaller colleges, many of which are understaffed and underfinanced, to develop such projects and will inform them of the aid and experienced assistance that is available. It will act as their liaison with the local leadership in determining what training programs are most urgently needed and in seeking out and selecting those trainees who are qualified and most in need of the training to be provided. To the extent necessary, it will assist in developing the programs and will help prepare them for presentation to the appropriate state and federal agencies involved.

While the preliminary steps are being taken with the colleges, the field staff will also seek out the established and potential leadership within the disadvantaged groups in the selected areas. Through interviews, meetings, and conferences, the field staff will present the possibilities to them and to the local community and help them to determine what training programs would be most immediately productive. At an early stage it would seek to involve the established leadership and organizational resources of the entire community in planning and developing the programs. It would particularly seek the participation of the local employment security office and vocational teachers and administrators. It would serve as liaison between these persons and groups and the participating colleges.

As the programs are developed, the field staff will render such assistance as is needed to see that they are carried successfully to completion. Throughout the project, the staff will develop a continuing working relationship with state educational and employment security agencies and with national and regional OMAT administrators, as well as with the Bureau of Employment Security and appropriate agencies of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. It will proceed as rapidly as possible to develop additional projects through other colleges and educational institutions in other areas in the selected states.

It is not possible to set forth a precise timetable for this pioneering program. It is anticipated, however, that the preliminary developmental work will be completed in about four months and that a further three months would be needed to work out the details of and secure the approval for the initial training programs. The remainder of the year would be devoted to carrying the programs forward and in developing new programs. It is hoped that after the first one is launched the others will develop with accelerating momentum.

Personnel Requirements

Field Coordinator. The Field Coordinator will be responsible for the overall organization, scope, pace, and functioning of the projects in all six states, and will provide overall supervision of staff and liaison with appropriate governmental agencies. He will be responsible for the actual execution in the field of the program in the six designated states. He will be based at the regional headquarters, probably in North Carolina. He will direct and supervise the work of the field representatives and will be available to assist them as needed in negotiation with community leaders and with educational, state, and local officials. He will decide what criteria and methods will shape the demonstration project and prepare a report at its conclusion.

Three Field Representatives. Each field representative will be primarily responsible for carrying out the project in two states and will have his base in one of them. His assignment will be flexible, however, and he may be called upon to assist another field representative temporarily if the progress of the overall project so requires. It may be desirable for all of the representatives to work initially with the coordinator in one state to develop and test their techniques.

The Honorable Lyndon B. Johnson
The White House
Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. President:

The Board of the National Sharecroppers Fund at its meeting on December 18, 1963, noted with approval a report in the Wall Street Journal that you are considering highlighting in your 1964 legislative program the "waging of war" against domestic poverty and ignorance. Our Board instructed me to convey to you our fervent hope that you will present this concern in your State of the Union Message to the Congress in January, and to set forth to you some of the aspects of the problem that are within the area of our particular concern.

The pockets of poverty in the rural Southeast are expanding at a rapid pace due to the shifting pattern of farming and agricultural technology. The persons who are being displaced are, because of centuries of educational deprivation and gross discrimination and neglect, even less equipped to cope with technological "displacement" than their industrial brothers in the urban North.

We particularly commend to your attention the article, "The Invisible Americans," in the December 21-28 issue of The Saturday Evening Post. This on-the-spot study dramatically illustrates the consequences of rural poverty on the lives and hopes of the families affected. Many of these families are somehow subsisting on a few hundred dollars a year.

Despite substantial progress in Southern industrialization, it has had little if any effect in alleviating rural poverty. Factories cannot be located where there is neither a market for their products nor adequate transportation facilities to bring the products to a market. They cannot be located where there is no water supply, no sewage disposal, no health or recreational facilities, and grossly inadequate public schooling. What is needed first--and now--is a vast new federal program of rural development of secondary roads for access to markets, water supply and sewage disposal, health clinics and rural schools, and decent housing to meet human needs and make industrial development possible. This program is urgently needed to give the rural areas the stimulus they need to advance economically and socially, and to create the markets that make factory location through Area Redevelopment and Rural Areas Development economically feasible. Such a program would indeed prime the pump of the rural economy and do much to relieve the mounting pressure upon the urban economy from the influx of the poorly educated, unskilled rural unemployed.

The problem is particularly acute for older rural persons who have spent most of their productive lives in agricultural work for which they are no longer needed. Many of these people, despite accumulating debt, have up to now been able to cling to their rural homes and their few acres of land. They cannot hold out much longer. It is both inhumane and uneconomic to force them to spend their declining years on welfare in a city slum. With an adequate federal program now, no senior citizen need fear so bleak a future. An imaginative program of grants-in-aid would give them the supplemental income they need to pay their debts and carry on a modified homesteading operation. If outright grants are deemed inadvisable, a part-time public works program such as WPA should be inaugurated to enable them to contribute to the physical improvement of the countryside while they live in dignity under their own roofs.

Rural youth, too, are in particular and urgent need of immediate help, for most of them will have to find their future off the farm. A large-scale training program is needed which will combine basic remedial education and realistic vocational training in present-day marketable skills with sufficient remuneration to provide both subsistence for the trainee and some assistance for the family at home--as was done in the Civilian Conservation Corps. It should lead into on-the-job training and employment in the larger federal development program and the expanding industries the latter program will encourage.

The National Sharecroppers Fund heartily endorses the other proposals suggested in the Wall Street Journal article. We have long advocated the elementary justice of minimum-wage coverage for farm workers, federal assistance for the education of migrant children, federal assistance to all needy dependent children, expansion of the food stamp plan and other programs for the distribution of food to the needy, and bringing to farm workers the protection of social legislation that most other workers have long enjoyed. These are all necessary but more is obviously needed now. That more is the public works, aid for the rural aging, and training of rural youth that we here urge upon you.

Sincerely yours,

/S/ Fay Bennett

The establishment of a new national clearing house and action center for the education of migrant children was announced today by Dr. Benjamin E. Mays, Chairman of the Migrant Children's Fund, and Mr. Henry B. Herman, Chairman of the National Child Labor Committee. The objective of the new program, the result of the merger of the two organizations, is a concentrated attack on the problems of the nation's most educationally and economically deprived group of children.

"We believe that a pooling of resources will help to break down the obstacles keeping migrant children from attaining equal educational opportunity and denying them legal protections in this last bastion of child labor on the American scene," said Dr. Mays and Mr. Herman in a joint statement. The new program is being partially financed by a grant to the Migrant Children's Fund from the Charles E. Merrill Trust.

The newly merged program establishes the National Committee on the Education of Migrant Children, with an advisory committee composed of both MCF and NCLC board members. The new Committee will work directly with educators, public officials, and community leaders to extend and improve educational opportunities for migrant children.

The National Committee on the Education of Migrant Children will collect and disseminate information about programs designed to meet the special educational needs of the hundreds of thousands of disadvantaged migrant children in the country. It will encourage state departments of education to include migrant children in their school programs, develop citizen support for programs to benefit these uprooted children, and consult with national government and voluntary agencies in this work.

Miss Cassandra Stockburger, for the past eight years Southern Representative for the Migrant Ministry of the National Council of Churches, has been appointed director of the new program.

The spokesmen for the two merging organizations pointed out that bills passed last year by the U.S. Senate would extend federal grants to states to enable them to provide greater educational opportunities for migrant children, and would amend the Fair Labor Standards Act to regulate the employment of children in agriculture outside of school hours. "House passage of these bills would greatly enhance the opportunities of migrant children to attain the educational benefits which they need in order to break out of the migrant pattern and prepare themselves for more productive lives," they said.

The Migrant Children's Fund was established in 1954, and during its nine years of existence it has provided grants for special educational projects, summer schools, and teacher training centers, and has conducted educational campaigns to develop wider public knowledge and concern for migrant children. Its officers, in addition to Dr. Mays, who is President of Morehouse College, include: Vice-Chairmen: Dr. Frank P. Graham, former President of the University of North Carolina; Dr. George I. Sanchez, Chairman of the Department of History and Philosophy of Education, University of Texas; and Secretary-Treasurer: I. Cyrus Gordon, Attorney at Law.

The National Child Labor Committee, which was established by an Act of Congress in 1904 to deal with the problem of child labor, has long had a special concern for migrant children and has frequently joined with the Migrant Children's Fund and other interested groups in programs on their behalf. Along with Mr. Herman, who is a Leader of the Ethical Society of New York, its officers are: Vice Chairmen: George S. Stevenson, M.D., former President of the World Federation of Mental Health, and Mrs. Mildred Jeffrey, Director, Community Relations, United Automobile Workers of America.

Dear Les:

I think you will be interested in seeing the enclosed statement which was presented on behalf of NSF to the House Labor Committee in support of the Anti-Poverty Bill. I'm also enclosing copies of some newspaper clippings which indicate that our farmer stole the show.

We brought Mr. Canty to Washington to participate in the Hearing. His straight-forward and earnest presentation made a great impression on the Congressmen who were present. Passage of this bill, along with necessary administrative reforms to ensure that its provisions are made available to the people who need them, can save an awful lot of people in the South from being forced off the land.

Sincerely,

Fay

NEW YORK POST, MONDAY, APRIL 13, 1964

Needy Farmer Testifies for Poverty Bill

Washington, April 13 (AP)—A 56-year-old Negro farmer from South Carolina, who said he was too poor to buy glasses, read alloud in halting tones today his statement to Congress describing his rural life and his support for President Johnson's anti-poverty bill.

The farmer, Willie Preston Canty of Pinewood, told the House Labor subcommittee that he was $9,887 in debt and ineligible under present law to get a loan from any federal farm agency.

He said the Johnson bill's provision for grants up to $1,500 to poor farmers would put him back on his feet.

A different view of such grants came from Dr. Harry L. Brown, a director of the American Farm Bureau Federation, who was the first witness to testify against the bill.

Brown, who was Assistant Secretary of Agriculture under Henry A. Wallace in the 1930s, said that grants and loans to poor farmers would, "Whatever the intention may be, operate to perpetuate subsistence farming and rural slums."

"The concept that low-income families should be settled and maintaine don little farms is an old and reactionary idea," Brown said. "The result would be stabilized, government-directed and subsidized poverty."

Brown said the Farm Bureau Federation supported "the farm loan program of the Farmers Home Administration, which is primarily designed to provide assistance to those farmers who can enlarge their enterprises to become economic-sized operators."

Farmer Canty was brought before the subcommittee by Fay Bennett, executive secretary of the National Sharecropers Fund. He read his statement so slowly and haltingly that Rep. Martin (R-Neb.) questioned whether he had written it himself.

Miss Bennett said that, although Canty did have help in the statement, the main reason why he read poorly was that he couldn't afford glasses.

Canty's statement said that because of three bad crop years and the need to pay hospitalization costs for his father, he had to mortgage his farm of 55 cleared acres and 57 uncleared acres.

"My total debt, including the mortgage and cost of machines, is $9,887," he said.

Canty said he had to support his wife and three unmarried sons. The oldest of these boys, an 18-year-old, has been working in a New York barber shop but will come home next week to help on the farm, Canty said.

FARM UNIT FIGHTS POVERTY PROGRAM

Bureau Leader Asserts Bill 'Does Violence to Budget'

By MARJORIE HUNTER
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, April 13—An assistant Secretary of Agriculture during the Depression said today that the American Farm Bureau Federation was solidly opposed to the Administration's antipoverty program.

"This program does violence to a balanced budget," Dr. Harry L. Brown of Georgia, a spokesman for the farm bureau, told a special House subcommittee.

He was the first witness to voice opposition to the antipoverty bill during the two weeks of hearings held so far by the subcommittee.

Two other farm groups—the National Farmers Union and the National Grange—were scheduled to testify today in support of the bill but were asked to come back later.

The subcommittee wanted to adjourn in time for the annual Congressional exodus to the ball park to witness the opening of the major league baseball season a game between the Washington Senators and the Los Angeles Angels.

"Maybe this describes the mood of the country today," Representative Edith Green, Democrat of Oregon, said dryly as the subcommittee prepared to adjourn, "For heaven's sakes, don't let poverty interfere with the baseball game."

Earlier, one of the nation's poverty statistics appeared in person before the subcommittee to describe his plight. Haltingly, at times painfully, Willie Preston Canty of Pinewood, S.C., read his prepared statement.

Mr Canty, a 56-year-old Negro explained that he was $9,887 in debt because of three bad crop years and his father's extended illness. He said he needed glasses but could not afford them.

Mr. Canty said that he and his family—a wife and three children—lived on their 112-acre farm, raising four crops from which they cleared $1,200 last year. He could not get credit from farm agencies, he said, and borrowed money at 7 per cent interest from a private individual.

Mr. Canty said he thought he could get back on his feet if he could obtain a $1,500 grant under the proposed antipoverty program. With the money, he said, he would buy some cattle, a planting machine and perhaps try to raise sweet potatoes.

My name is Fay Bennett. I am Executive Secretary of the National Sharecroppers Fund, an organization which has been working for more than a quarter of a century to bring economic and social justice to sharecroppers, tenants, small farmers, and farm workers. I appreciate the opportunity to appear before this Committee to testify to the necessity for a broad federal program to end rural poverty. We support H.R. 10440 as an important step in that direction. We are particularly interested in Title III of the Bill, in the section to help young people through the work-study, work-training, and job corps programs, and in the rural community action programs.

There is much talk about the exodus from the land. We all know that in the last few decades millions of Americans have left the farm and have gone to the city. We know that American research and know-how have made possible the production of a super-abundance of food and fiber, with fewer and fewer people. Just the other day, the financial pages of the New York Times (April 10) told of new developments to harvest prunes and lettuce mechanically. Machines are replacing men on the farm as they are in the factories.

It almost seems as though people are becoming obsolete. When machinery becomes obsolete, we scrap it. Are we also to put our jobless people on the scrap heap? It seems that this is what happens when we offer the jobless the alternative of starving or seeking relief checks.

A nation's human resources are its most important component. This is why the Economic Opportunity Bill is such a necessary and hopeful first step in the war on poverty. It offers hope that a civilized nation with a highly developed technology, educational system, and culture can do the necessary providing and planning to rescue its poor, its unemployed, and its underemployed from despair.

How will it do this?

Here is how the bill will work to help the rural poor. Title III provides for grants of up to $1,500 and loans of up to $2,500 to low-income rural families who have a reasonable possibility of bringing about a permanent increase in their income. They could do this by improving their land or acquiring more land, improving their operations, participating in cooperative associations, paying off debts, and generally "getting on their feet." They would also get technical assistance and help in planning for a better income-producing operation. Those who do not own any land of their own could buy a family-size farm from a nonprofit corporation which, under the Bill, could acquire available land and develop it for resale to low-income farm families. Its cost is slight and can mark the difference between remaining independent and being reduced to relief. This is the realistic help that many of these persons need to gain self-sufficiency.

By now this Committee is well aware of the fact that one out of three rural families (over 15 million in all) has a cash income of less than $3,000 a year. Yet $3,000 would seem like great wealth to the more than five million farm families (some of whom are hired farm workers) whose yearly income may be a few hundred dollars, or perhaps $1,000, but less than $2,000. These are the people who do not have enough to eat, whose children go to bed hungry and often do not have a pair of shoes. Their houses are unsafe, and the wind and rain blow through. They sleep four and five to a bed. They are in despair. They must have help.

Many people in these situations write to our office and ask what they can do to help themselves. Here is one such case: Mrs. C. is a sharecropper in north Leflore County in the Mississippi Delta. She has eleven children. Her two oldest sons, aged 15 and 17, help her work the farm. They raised 24 bales of cotton last year, but all she got in the settlement was $500, on which all twelve are barely surviving. "In severe need of clothes and food," the report to our office says.

What will happen if Mrs. C. finally gives up this seemingly hopeless struggle to survive on the land? Or, what is more likely, if she is forced off by her landlord's decision to fully mechanize his cotton crop? She will probably not find work to feed, clothe, and house her family of twelve in the country or in the city. They most probably will all be reduced to complete dependence upon welfare, at a tremendous cost to her dignity, her children's future, and the economy of the community. If they come to New York City, they will join the 470,000 persons who were on the Department of Welfare's rolls in January, 1964--six per cent of the population. This welfare cost $34,668,000 for the month, for an average of $180.62 for each of the over 190,000 family cases on the rolls. If Mrs. C.'s family were paid only the average, it would come to $2,167.44 for the year.

Will the Economic Opportunity Bill help Mrs. C.? Probably not directly, and not much. But it could give her children a chance to break out of this pattern, through the work-study, work-training, and job corps programs. And it could and will help many rural families whose situation is not so extreme.

Here is the case of Mrs. D., a South Carolina widow: She and her sons, aged 27, 18, and 14, work her 109-acre farm, 70 acres of which are cleared. She raises cotton, soybeans, and tobacco. Her debts amount to $2,500, and her income is insufficient to warrant a Farmers Home Administration loan to help her improve her situation. Under Title III of this Bill, she might be eligible for a grant or a loan from FHA, along with help in planning for a more efficient and profitable farming operation. Other provisions of the Bill would help her sons prepare for a better future.

Another story comes from Mr. W. P. Canty, who is here today. He writes as follows:

"I am Willie Preston Canty. I live in Pinewood, Clarendon County, South Carolina. I have lived and worked on a farm all my life. I am still anxious to stay on a farm. I am now 56 years of age. I have a wife and three children to support. I have been operating a farm for 36 years. I raise four crops in addition to raising hogs and vegetables for my family as well as for sale.

"Last year, I was able to raise 20 bales of cotton which grossed $3,000, $400 worth of tobacco with an allotment of one acre, and $100 for soybeans. I also raise some corn. My gross income from the farm was $3,500. After paying all expenses, I had about $1,200 left. There has been a gradual decrease in the tobacco allotment which has helped to decrease my income. I was forced to mortgage my farm, which is composed of 112 acres with 55 acres clear land. My total debt including the mortgage and cost of machines is $9,887.

"Many of my relatives and friends have left the farm because of heavy indebtedness and poor crop yield plus inability to get credit. I have found it very difficult to get proper credit from agencies which lend to other farmers. My friends who have gone to cities bring back some disturbing stories about the conditions in which they have to live in some areas. I should like to stay on my farm and raise my children in the country where I feel it is best for all of us; in fact, at my age changing from the farm would not be easy nor helpful."

Mr. Canty will gladly answer any questions the Committee may wish to ask him.

I think that legislators from the urban areas should be deeply interested in supporting the part of Title II of the Bill which calls for community action programs in the rural as well as the urban areas. Our cities are already overcrowded and staggering under the almost crushing burden of trying to meet the needs of millions of uneducated, poorly educated, and untrained people who have already been cast off the land. We dare not add to this intolerable burden. Many of our urban centers are potentially explosive because of the unmet needs of the millions of rural cast-offs.

The community action programs could spark the efforts needed to improve rural health and social services, education, job training and counseling, economic development, and housing. Other programs already authorized will gain greater impetus through a joint community effort aided by federal financing. All of this could bring about a rebirth in our rural areas, relieve the overcrowding in our cities, and help the nation along the road to economic prosperity and social health.

The Bill's loan program to local cooperatives to help low-income farmers would provide essential production, processing, purchasing, marketing, and other services and facilities which may make the difference between survival and going under. This is not a new idea. This kind of program literally saved thousands of small farmers during the thirties. Many of these small and struggling farmers of the thirties have become big and prosperous through their cooperatives. They aren't interested in the little fellow who today is struggling to survive as they struggled to survive thirty years ago. The government of the people in a democracy must care. It must now offer the seed money, along with the technical assistance needed, the guidance, and the intelligent planning to reawaken and renew rural communities.

Of course I am not suggesting that this Bill will bring about the millennium. Lots more is needed in the way of public works programs, extending the minimum wage and unemployment insurance to farm workers, etc.

The provisions of H.R. 10440 will help to make a family self-sufficient, able to provide its members with adequate food, clothing, and shelter. It will bring new dignity and new hope to the mothers and fathers of these families. It will save the taxpayers millions of dollars in relief and welfare payments, which often perpetuate poverty because they do not give a family the basic help needed for a new start.

In addition, it will give local leadership the opportunity to work hand in hand with local government, state government, and federal government to take advantage of the many programs available for education, vocational training, health, and welfare. It will spur cultural development and spiritual growth.

Who can say what kind of new awakening can come from giving those now left out a chance to be included in the promise of the American dream? Who can say what new musicians will develop, new writers and composers, new orchestras and choral and theater groups, and new strength for Americans to think and work and plan together for a better country for all?

Dear Fay:

Your letter of May 1 has been read and discussed here pretty throughly by the staff, and we are able now to give you a considered response to it.

Let me say, first, that we all have a strong interest (a) in the program you propose and (b) in participation in it by the Southern Regional Council and the state councils on human relations.

We believe that the soundest approach is one that would draw most directly on the special resources and skills of each participating group.

We would, therefore, like for you to consider and discuss with us a modification of your proposal along the following general lines:

1. The states in which program would be carried on would be selected by considering need and opportunities, the interest of the state council in the program, and the state council's capability of administering it along with its other programs. Tentatively, we would think that promising states as of now are (in more or less order of eligibility) South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas.

2. As you wrote in your proposal, the program "has the advantage of flexible development, on a state by state basis, as funds become available."

3. The staff person assigned to each state would be under the supervision and direction of the state council director.

4. Recruitment of the staff person would be a joint responsibility of NSF and the state council.

5. The NSF would provide staff training.

6. The NSF's Project Director would provide regular consultation and advice to the field staff, would keep this program in liaison with other NSF programs and with SRC, would be available for special conferences, workshops, etc. and would help the field staff plan and administer such, and would assist as he could and as you saw desirable in consultations with federal offices.

7. The Southern Regional Council would receive and disburse funds and would select, after discussion with all concerned, the state councils which would participate.

8. SRC would also undertake research and publications in this field, as seemed to it desirable on the basis of advice from NSF and the state councils.

9. NSF would support fully the fund-raising efforts of SRC for this program.

In short, we would make certain decisions as to place and would contribute research; NSF would provide the technical skills; and the state councils would carry out the work.

Finally, we feel strongly that program planning in the field should be done in such a way as to make the program and its staff relevant to the whole problem of poverty and under-education. The situations of the rural and urban poor are closely related. I hasten to make clear that we understand and believe that this program should be confined to the rural South. We would hope, however, that the program would have a built-in readiness, if ever the opportunity developed, to become a contributing part of an integrated private agency program addressed to the whole problem.

Please write to me with your comments as soon as you have had a chance to consider these suggestions. I would hope that you could, at the same time, make clear for us again how this program, as you see it, would differ from and be related to your MDTA program which Dr. Williams will, I understand, direct. Although you have fully explained this to us, I am afraid that none of us has got the picture clearly in mind.

All best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

Leslie W. Dunbar

Dear Leslie:

Thank you for your letter of May 22 in response to our proposal for a cooperative program with SRC and the state councils on human relations in rural areas of some of the southern states.

In general, the specific modifications you suggest are in line with our thinking. The only points which I think need additional clarification are numbers 3 and 8 of your letter.

Under number 3, you state, "The staff person assigned to each state would be under the supervision and direction of the state council director." We think that you should add, "and the appropriate officer of the National Sharecroppers Fund who will be directing rural field work."

Under number 8, I would merely add the suggestion that the research and publications in this field might be undertaken and carried out in cooperation with NSF.

I would also question the paragraph following your numbered points which says, "In short, we would make certain decisions as to place and would contribute research; NSF would provide the technical skills; and the state councils would carry out the work." It seems to us that SRC is making too sharp a delineation between the functions of NSF and the state councils. We feel, based on our experience in South Carolina and our work in other states, that the considerable knowledge we have of the multitude of governmental and private programs available to meet the needs of small farmers and impoverished rural people in the South would make it very necessary for our staff to do more than provide the technical skills. The rural field staff employed under this program would need some direction from our national staff and would need help from NSF generally in many ways to work effectively. In other words, there should be a mutually agreed upon joint direction of the rural field man's work.

There is no question in our minds but that this whole program would benefit the state councils greatly and would help recruit rural leaders as members of the state councils and would encourage the setting up of local councils in areas where these could be effective.

The final point you raise concerns how this field program would differ from and be related to our OMAT program which Dr. J. Earl Williams will direct. The latter will concentrate solely on developing training programs for rural unemployed, along with recruiting people to take the training and helping to open up employment opportunities. While NSF's field work would support this effort, NSF also works to develop many more opportunities and programs in rural areas for economic and social development. These include farmer cooperatives, credit unions, farm and rural housing loans, operating loans, and bringing knowledge and helping local groups attain many other services and programs which they need.

I expect to be in Knoxville June 6th and 7th for briefing meetings with our OMAT training staff and can easily stop off in Atlanta on Monday or Tuesday, June 8th or 9th, to discuss all of this in greater detail with you and others of your staff whom you would like to have sit in on such a meeting. Please let me know if you'd like me to plan to meet with you then.

Dear Frances:

You will be glad to know that Jac Wasserman will be in Atlanta from June 3rd to the 8th to make arrangements for moving his family there, and to meet with you and others in preparation for his work in Georgia and to get in closer touch with our Southern field people. He then plans to begin his work in Georgia officially on July 1st.

While Leslie Dunbar has offered office space to Jac, we feel it would be more desirable at this stage for him and us to accept your gracious offer to let him work out of your Georgia office on an expense-shared basis, since he expects to be spending considerable time doing field work in Georgia until we are able to expand our field staff.

Enclosed is a copy of my letter to Leslie Dunbar in reply to his recent letter on the possibility of a joint project with NSF.

Sincerely,

Dear Fay:

Enclosed is our draft of the proposal. We have lifted much of the language of your original document, though have tried to hold the length to a minimum.

The number of states to participate has been left open--"up to eleven"--to allow us to work with whatever resources we can find. Also, in this regard we have keyed the overhead for NSF and SRC to the resources. Should the total program be funded your overhead needs and ours would follow the idea expressed in your last letter. They will, of course, be reduced corresponding to any overall reduction in resources. We felt this was the only way to get around large sums for overhead before the program funds could begin to be used.

I think the enclosed follows closely our discussions here and comes out as an attractive proposal. Needless to say, feel free to make any revisions you see fit.

The wheels grind slowly, but I am encouraged that they grind.

Best wishes.

Sincerely,

Paul Anthony

The Rural Advancement Project

- for final Proposal + List of Foun dations appealed to See: Rural Advancement Proj. file. MJ

The Rural Advancement Project is a cooperative program for economic, health, and educational advancement in the rural areas of southern states sponsored by the state Councils on Human Relations, the National Sharecroppers Fund, and the Southern Regional Council.

Goals of the Program:

1) To stimulate the development of local rural leadership and community organization.

2) To document the needs of local areas and to present findings and recommendations to appropriate federal, state, and local administrative agencies.

3) To bring information about available federal and state programs to those who are eligible but have thus far not benefitted and to assist them in obtaining the benefits to which they are entitled.

4) To combat discriminatory practices in the administration of government programs designed to assist low-income farm and other rural people.

The Need and Opportunity:

Despite an outmigration of millions of people from the rural areas in the past two decades, rural underemployment is currently estimated to be the equivalent of four million persons. If the openings needed for rural young people in the next decade are added, the job gap becomes eight million.

Continued outmigration is not a satisfactory answer to this situation. Some people who have spent their lives in farming are too old or too ill-educated to learn another trade. Many farm workers and young people would like to stay in rural communities if training and employment opportunities were available. Further, those who leave the rural areas usually lack the skills needed to compete successfully in the shrinking industrial job market. Under these conditions migration is likely to mean a swelling of city relief rolls rather than a better life for the migrants. What is needed is the rebuilding of the rural areas to provide work opportunities, social services, and the amenities of civilized living.

This is true of all rural people. But by every standard--income, employment, education, housing, health and welfare services--the situation of the southern rural Negro compared with that of the white is worsening, both relatively and, often, absolutely. In the most important escape route from poverty and despair--education--the number of farm whites 25 to 29 years of age who were high school graduates in 1950 was 18% more than that of non-whites; by 1960 the difference had increased to 30%.

These people who are most deprived, rural Negroes, are those who have the hardest time getting help. Traditional patterns of exclusion and discrimination have barred them. They have not known what to ask for and how to go about it.

Government programs are available: Area Redevelopment, Manpower Retraining, and surplus food programs can aid non-farm as well as farm people in rural areas. Farm loans and grants, crop loans, insurance and allotments, and various Extension services can aid low-income farmers, tenants, and sharecroppers.

The expanded program of the national war on poverty should make it possible to reach some who were too poor to qualify for previous forms of aid--and its wide popular support should create a climate in which state and local cooperation is easier to secure.

The Cooperative Program:

This idea of a cooperative effort has developed because of the several unique assets of the agencies involved.

The state Councils on Human Relations have established offices, professionally staffed, in the several southern states. They have ini intimate knowledge of their states, experience in working in localities, and established memberships.

The National Sharecroppers Fund has developed over a period of almost 30 years a high degree of experience and technical knowledge in this specialized area. It enjoys also a cordial relationship with officials in Washington whose cooperation is required for this program.

The Southern Regional Council has superior research resources and a close cooperative relationship with the state Councils on Human Relations. It is in a position to determine in which states this program can be most effectively developed. The agency's administrative experience can be used in the distribution of funds and seeing to their proper usage. The SRC research staff, in consultation with NSF, is available to carry out pertinent research projects and distribute needed information.

The program would be organized as follows:

1) A staff person for this program would be added to each state Council on Human Relations participating.

a) There are presently eleven state Councils. The program here proposed is a flexible one and, depending on the availability of funds, could be carried on in from one to eleven states.

b) The states in which program would be carried on would be selected by the Southern Regional Council after considering need and opportunities, the interest of the state Council in the program, and the state Council's capability of administering it along with its other program.

c) NSF would recruit and train personnel, to be placed with the approval of the appropriate state Council director.

d) The staff person assigned to each state would be under the administrative supervision and direction of the state Council director. Program planning would be provided through the cooperative action of the state Council and NSF.

2) The National Sharecroppers Fund will establish a regional office in Atlanta headed by a regional program director. This office, with the assistance of the NSF national office, will provide staff training, regular consultation and advice to the field staff, liaison with other NSF programs and, with SRC, would be available for special conferences, workshops, etc., and would assist in consultations with federal offices.

3) The Southern Regional Council would receive and disburse funds and would select, after discussion with all concerned, the state Councils which would participate. SRC would also undertake research and publications in this field, as seemed to it desirable on the basis of advice from NSF and the state Councils.

Proposed Annual Budget

Programs of eleven state Councils @ $14,120 per Council	$155,320.00
NSF regional office	23,500.00
Total cost for eleven states	$178,820.00

As was noted above, however, this is a flexible program that can be started state by state. Furthermore, if only one or two states were participating, the budget for the NSF regional office would be somewhat lower. The budgeted figures include an allowance of 15% for administrative and research costs, to be divided equally between the Southern Regional Council and the NSF national office.

Dear Fay:

Congratulations on the contract award from the Department of Labor. I think it is a very exciting thing that the Department has turned to you for this help, which you are better qualified to give than anyone else.

We may have some later suggestions of people, in reply to your letter of January 17, and if so, I shall send them to you. In the meantime, two persons you might think about are:

(1) Ozelle Sutton, Associate Director of the Arkansas Council on Human Relations.

(2) William Bagwell, staff member, American Friends Service Committee, High Point, North Carolina.

Both of these are people we are able to recommend strongly for the kind of work which is outlined in the project summary.

All best wishes.

Dear Dr. Dunbar:

The National Sharecroppers Fund has just been awarded a contract from the U.S. Department of Labor to act as its agent on behalf of the Manpower Development and Training Program to encourage and stimulate training programs among the "hard-core" unemployed and underemployed in the rural areas of six Southern states. I enclose a one-page summary of the project.

I am writing to you now to ask for your suggestions for competent staff people to carry out the project. We are looking first for a field coordinator and would expect him to help in the search for the other three staff people.

I am sure you agree with us that this project is a very exciting one and offers great hope for opening the door to education and training in neglected rural areas in the South where federal agencies have hardly made a dent.

To realize the full potential of this project, we will need a field coordinator who is not only capable, creative, imaginative and knowledgeable about the South, but also the kind of person who can work cooperatively with state officials, educators, and the local people who need the training which will be offered. He would need administrative ability to set up a regional office and direct the work of three field people. He would also need persistence and energy in large measure. The salary would be commensurate with the qualifications of the person.

I do hope you will let me hear from you immediately if you can suggest someone whose qualities approach this description and who might be interested in taking on this important assignment.

Sincerely,

Fay Bennett

Summary of an 18 month Demonstration Project
In Developing Job Training Programs Among the "Hard-Core" Unemployed
And Underemployed in Southern Rural Areas, Under Sec. 201
Of the Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962

Project Agency. National Sharecroppers Fund is a non-profit, voluntary agency with 25 years of experience working to aid rural Southern farm people. Its primary recent emphasis has been to assist, through conferences, informational material, and a field staff, the most disadvantaged rural people in finding solutions to their economic and social problems through participation in governmental farm programs and cooperatives. Its functioning National Board includes authorities in the fields of rural sociology and adult education who will assist in the planning and execution of the project.

Characteristics and Needs of Trainees. Sharecroppers and farm workers who are being displaced by a changing economy often lack the basic education and experience needed to adjust to urban industrial life. They are rural people who, with training and planning, can find more skilled employment on the land and in small rural communities. They have had little experience with state employment offices and are not now being reached by them.

Purpose and Program of Project. The project is designed to demonstrate that unused resources of leadership within the poorer areas of the rural South, in cooperation with the smaller, predominantly Negro colleges, can effectively develop programs of job training that will enable many unemployed persons to lead economically useful lives in their own communities. During the course of 18 months, the agency expects to assist in developing at least two programs in each of the following six states: North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Tennessee. It expects that 1500-2000 trainees will participate.

By using its experience and local contacts, the agency will reach leaders and potential leaders among the rural groups who are not now being utilized in developing training programs. It will assist them and their communities to analyze their training needs in the light of existing and potential job possibilities and help them to develop a fruitful working relationship with the employment services, agricultural vocational agencies, cooperating colleges, and other state and federal agencies.

NSF will encourage the sponsorship of training programs by those colleges that are best qualified by experience to teach the inadequately prepared, but that have hitherto been restrained by lack of staff and funds from exploiting the potentials of serving in this way. It will help them to establish active relationships with the local communities that need the programs and will assist them in the preparation of these programs. It will seek to develop cooperative action for training between these colleges and larger ones that may have greater staff and facilities available.

Personnel Requirements. The project will require one Field Coordinator and three Field Representatives responsible for two states each, and appropriate secretarial-clerical assistance.

It occurs to me that Les Dunbar should send a copy of our joint proposal to:

cc: Fay Bennett

Mr. Eliot D. Pratt
The Eliot Pratt Foundation
177 E. 71st Street
New York, N.Y. 10021

I had first thought we should not write to Eliot Pratt about this since he is our Treasurer. However, his personal contributions to NSF come out of his personal funds since NSF is not tax exempt. Therefore it should do no harm but should instead be a good idea to send the proposal and request for funds to the Eliot Pratt Foundation.

I would think Les would want to add a sentence where it fits into his letter, saying something to the effect that of course it isn't necessary to tell Eliot about NSF since he is so deeply involved and knows all about our work, and he's sure that if Eliot wants to talk about it any more he can call me.

I will look for you and Les at the NAIRO meeting Wednesday morning.

Dear Les:

Enclosed is a copy of our most recent progress report on the OMAT project under the supervision of the National Sharecroppers Fund and financed by the Department of Labor to stimulate the development of training programs for hard-core unemployed and underemployed in southern rural areas. Also enclosed, in case you haven't seen one is a little information sheet which tells about this project. And while I'm at it, let me enclose a very short report which gives a glimpse of our work.

As soon as I get word from your office that copies of our joint proposal has been sent to the additional Foundations which we discussed on the telephone yesterday, I will try to see some of the principals involved with the Foundations as soon as I can to interpret further the aims of our program. I shall also plan to see some of the other people we talked about at the NAIRO conference.

As soon as I have something definite to report, you will be hearing from me.

With all good wishes,

Sincerely,

Fay

SUBJECT: Progress Report No. 4, Southern Rural Training Project: National Sharecroppers Fund--OMAT Demonstration Project No. P 3-64.

The weeks of background work and our emphasis on attempting to establish a good working relationship with the agencies with whom we must work, as well as others with similar interests, is beginning to pay off. Our staff has been responsible for a wide-spread infusion of ideas into existing federal, state, and local agencies across the South. We have also made a conscious effort to involve as many individuals and groups as possible in the development of training proposals. As a result, almost the entire time of the staff is now being spent in assisting organizations in drafting the preliminary prospectuses to be forwarded to the OMAT office. In this regard, we have developed the first two parts to a training project development kit to be used in drafting a preliminary prospectus. This has received favorable comment from institutions and affected agencies, including the Atlanta and Dallas offices of OMAT. A copy of the kit is attached.

Perhaps our greatest problem is the matching provision of the MDTA Act which supposedly goes into effect on July 1, 1965. Although some states are willing to gamble on a change in the law and, thus, approve a project which goes beyond July 1, 1965; others insist that all projects be terminated by July 1. This can sometimes be overcome by designing the project so that only non-matching items such as regular OJT or special services of contracting agencies remain after July 1. In other cases, we are designing projects to start on January 1, 1965, and largely terminate by July 1, 1965. This means that we are under extreme pressure to get an acceptable preliminary prospectus from each institution to the Washington OMAT office, and after getting OMAT's reaction, moving as quickly as possible through the approval stages for the final proposal in order to have the projects funded sometime in December. We are attempting to speed up this process by involving as many of the agencies which must approve the final proposal at as early a stage as feasible and by informal talks with OMAT staff in Washington.

With the above policy in mind, the current status in regard to preliminary prospectuses is as follows:

A. Proposals to be discussed informally with OMAT, BES, and HEW in Washington in early October.

1. The Memphis State University prospectus has been submitted to OMAT. Personnel from the University, along with the Project Director and Field Representative handling Tennessee will be present to discuss final plans for this project.

2. Fort Valley State College of Fort Valley, Georgia, will submit a prospectus to our office in time for the Washington meeting.

3. The Chattanooga City School System will submit a prospectus to our office in time for the Washington meeting.

4. Although the prospectus from Austin Peay State College, Clarksville, Tennessee, will not be ready in time for the meeting, a detailed statement and explanation of the project will be prepared by this office in time for the meeting.

5. The Institute of Human Relations, Loyola University, New Orleans, is preparing a proposal covering several skills for training in two geographical areas and including some recruitment in Mississippi, as well as Louisiana. Although the draft of this project is not as far along as the others, the broad objectives and training possibilities will be presented by the Project Director.

B. Other Prospects and Investigations.

1. Several competing organizations in South Carolina are anxious to take the lead in a broad experimental and demonstration project. The staff is attempting to work out a compromise proposal utilizing the efforts of all the groups. If this effort fails, a backstop proposal has been developed. Consequently, a prospectus should be submitted before the end of the year.

2. Initial groundwork has been completed with a junior college in Mississippi which should be able to conduct a competent project for prospective NASA employees. Assuming the proper environment exists, the preliminary prospectus could be ready in November.

3. Preliminary work has been done in the Delta area of Mississippi. More must be done before any definite proposals are developed. There are at least two competent institutions in the area that are desirous of developing a training project. Assuming more groundwork and the proper environment, a prospectus could be completed before the end of the year.

4. Initial contacts have been made with two other institutions in Louisiana which have expressed an interest in developing projects.

5. Meetings have been held with interested parties in the NASA area of Alabama. A real training possibility exists in the area, and the staff will devote time to promoting a project as soon as it can be scheduled.

6. Depending upon the outcome of the Washington meetings, initial investigations may be conducted in North Carolina in October. A cooperative effort with the North Carolina Fund would be initiated.

7. Extensive investigations are being conducted in the Augusta and Savannah areas of Georgia.

Jobs for Farm Workers

TO THE EDITOR:

Columbia University economist Joseph Froomkin has found that only a small minority of the current manpower retraining programs "appear likely to get the trainees off the unemployment rolls," according to a report in The Times of July 6. Mr. Froomkin is especially skeptical about training workers in farming . . . .

My own knowledge and experience in this field convince me that retraining can greatly benefit farm workers . . . in alleviating their abysmal conditions.

Certainly the labor requirements of the nation's farms are changing under the impact of vastly improved technology. But the workers currently being displaced from the land can and should be taught to operate the new machinery. Often such retraining must begin with equipping them with the basic skills of literacy . . . .

Currently several excellent training programs are in progress for farm workers . . . . Some are sponsored by the Area Redevelopment Administration and some by the Manpower Development and Training Act. Along with basic literacy courses, these provide training in the operation and maintenance of farm machinery, pruning and other skills . . . .

There are other training courses which can improve the standard of living of these low-income people. Among these are small-farm management and the principles and management of farm cooperatives and credit unions. The United States Government is today conducting just this sort of training around the world with great success . . . .

The National Sharecroppers Fund has recently contracted with the Office of Manpower, Automation and Training to help set up some of these important programs in the rural areas of six Southern states. They will be reaching farm people whose yearly income is less than one-third of what is considered the poverty level. At least 25 per cent of these workers are functionally illiterate.

I should like to suggest that basic changes must occur in our agricultural labor patterns before we can provide adequate gainful employment in rural America. Three essential changes are ending the importation of surplus foreign labor, abolishing racial discrimination in Federal and state economic aid programs, and extending minimum wage coverage and the right to union recognition to farm workers . . . .

FAY BENNETT,
Executive Secretary,
National Sharecroppers Fund.

SOUTHERN RURAL TRAINING PROJECT

The Southern Rural Training Project is a training demonstration project of the National Sharecroppers Fund under Section 201 of the Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962.

PROJECT OBJECTIVES

The project is designed to demonstrate that local leadership in poorer areas of the rural south, in cooperation with local institutions and organizations, can develop effective training programs that will help unemployed and underemployed persons lead economically useful lives. During the year staff members expect to assist in developing programs in each of the following six states: Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee. Other southern states may be added later.

The project staff through local contacts will work with leadership of rural groups in developing training programs. Training needs will be analyzed in terms of existing jobs and possi bilities for job development and economic improvement. Communities will be assisted in developing effective working relationships with the employment services, agricultural agencies, cooperating educational institutions, and other state and federal agencies concerned with training and economic development. The staff which is composed of persons on leave from educational and governmental posts is experienced in working with these groups.

THE NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND

The National Sharecroppers Fund is a non-profit, voluntary agency of more than twenty-five years' experience in working with southern sharecroppers, tenant farmers, and other low-income farm and rural families. Through this work NSF has gained contacts throughout the South and has developed programs for rural people who are hard to reach through normal governmental channels. In these programs NSF has worked cooperativelv with many church leaders, educators, and community relations leaders.

MANPOWER DEVELOPMENT AND TRAINING ACT OF 1962

As indicated above the project is under Section 201 of this act as quoted below:

Sec. 201. In carrying out the purposes of this Act, the Secretary of Labor shall determine the skill requirements of the economy, devel op policies for the adequate occupational development and maximum utilization of the skills of Nation's workers, promote and encourage the development of broad and diversified training programs, including on-the-job training, designed to qualify for employment the many persons who cannot reasonably be expected to secure full-time employment without such training, and to equip the Nation's workers with the new and improved skills that are or will be required.

President Lyndon B. Johnson in his Manpower Report of March 1964 said "We must have new willingness to experiment with fresh approaches and put resulting knowledge to practical use." In using this approach the Southern Rural Training Project's work will be geared to the three fundamental goals of the President's Active Manpower Policy:

The first is to develop the abilities of our people.

Another is to create jobs to make the most of these abilities.

The third is to link the first two, to match people and jobs.

Miss Mary Dykeman

Dear Miss Dykeman:

I am sorry to have missed you when you called the last few times. I think you have some idea of how terribly busy we are these days.

I am glad to know that you are interested in making a tax-exempt contribution to the work of the National Sharecroppers Fund. This can be done under our joint program with the Southern Regional Council and State Councils on Human Relations under the Rural Advancement Project. The check should be sent directly to the Southern Regional Council, addressed to Mr. Paul Anthony, Executive Director, at 5 Forsyth Street, N. W., Atlanta 3, Georgia.

Enclosed is a copy of the Project proposal which includes a budget for eleven states as well as for a National Sharecroppers Fund regional office. Sufficient funds have already been obtained for this Project to finance rural field work in four of these states; namely, South Carolina, Georgia and, more recently, Alabama and Florida. In some cases a foundation has provided the financing of the budget for a whole state or more than a state, and in other cases such as Georgia, several smaller contributions were made by small family trusts until we had enough money to employ a person for that state under this co-operative program.

I hope that your gift can be allocated to our regional office in Atlanta which supervises this field work. With the addition of Florida and Alabama under this program, our Field Director, Mr. Jac Wasserman, who works out of our regional office in Atlanta, must now supervise the rural work of our field staff in seven states. This is a great burden upon him and he should have additional assistance as well as more travel money. Thus far the National Sharecroppers Fund is financing our regional office and the work of our Field Director from its own resources. It would be of considerable help if some of this burden was taken up by our Rural Advancement Project which would make possible more effective direction of our rural field work from our regional office.

Also enclosed is "A Glimpse of NSF's Program in Action". Separately I am sending you a report of one of our conferences held at Bricks, North Carolina, which is called "A Better Life for Farm Families." I think you will find reading this little booklet of great interest to you, and it will give you a good idea of how effective such conferences are. Since the Bricks conference we have had two conferences in South Carolina, one in Mississippi, one in Georgia, and we are now planning one for Alabama. The conferences plant many seeds which come to life after the conference participants go home. As an example, if you will read the quotation I have marked on page 2 of the pamphlet, the follow-up to this is that the small rural co-operative, of which the priest was president, was one of the first Southern rural groups to receive a loan from the Office of Economic Opportunity. Father McKnight used the knowledge he received from the conference, and subsequent help and guidance which we were able to supply, to make use of several government programs which he had not known about previously.

Do let me know if I can give you any further information about our work or about our co-operative program with the Southern Regional Council under the Rural Advancement Project.

With all good wishes.

Sincerely yours,

Fay Bennett

Dear Mr. Dunbar:

I am extending a cordial invitation to you on behalf of our Board of Directors to attend a private Consultation on the Southern Rural Training Project, and a luncheon meeting to discuss involving the rural poor in meaningful antipoverty programs.

The Consultation will take place at the Dinkler-Plaza Hotel in Atlanta on January 30th and 31st. It will bring together the staff of the Southern Rural Training Project, NSF's field staff, NSF's Advisory Committee, governmental officials, and a few specially invited regional and state leaders of private agencies.

The Consultation will hear reports from our Southern Rural Training Project staff who have assisted local institutions in developing several excellent training projects for hard-core rural unemployed in some of the southern states.

We believe you will find the Consultation highly rewarding and we will be glad to have your participation in the discussion of how to effectively carry out training and antipoverty programs involving the rural poor in the southern region.

Enclosed is a program of the Consultation as well as a folder which briefly describes our Southern Rural Training Project. We hope very much that you will find it possible to attend this Consultation or as much of it as your schedule permits.

I look forward to hearing from you and hope that I will see you in Atlanta on January 30th.

Sincerely,

Dear Paul:

Thank you very much for sending us your check for $2500, representing the first quarterly payment on the grant from the Aaron E. Norman Fund to the Rural Advancement Project for support of the National Sharecroppers Fund Southern Regional Office and a strengthened program of workshops for field work.

We are depositing this money in a special account and are setting up a special set of books to handle receipts and disbursements for the Rural Advancement Project.

We shall see to it that the funds are used in the way stipulated by the Norman Fund. We shall also provide you with a financial report indicating that the funds under this grant are being properly used.

We look forward to a strengthened program making possible greater services to the rural poor.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. J.P.'s 32-acre farm in Tipton County, Tennessee, was to be sold at auction to pay off a local bank. The county FHA had refused to refinance the loan. Sale of the farm would have left the family and an aged, invalid mother with no home and no place to go. NSF stepped in; negotiations reopened. When reversal of the FHA decision came, not only was the bank paid off, but a new four-room home and a tractor were financed. Increased income from the tractor is making possible regular loan payments, and the J.P. family expects to be able to add inside running water by fall of 1966.

"THE CONDITION OF FARM WORKERS"

NSF supporters, students, librarians, editors, and others who rely on our annual reports for an accurate highlighting of developments from year to year, will be glad to know that "The Condition of Farm Workers in 1965" will be ready by spring. NSF's own greatly expanded activities demanded this separate report to our contributors.

1965 In the second year of the nation's war against poverty, the National Sharecroppers Fund again greatly expanded its work in the rural South. There is an increasing urgency — and increasing opportunity — for NSF's program. Racial discrimination and changing patterns in agriculture must not continue to force the rural poor from the land and into city slums where, untrained, they face a life of deepening poverty and growing despair. It is encouraging that the opportunities to build a better and stable family life in rural communities are increasing through governmental, cooperative, and self-help programs. Bringing the knowledge, training, and technical assistance necessary to seize these opportunities is the core of NSF's Southern work. This work must be accelerated.

THE CHALLENGE

Equal Opportunity in Farm Programs

For years, NSF has charged discrimination in services to Negro farmers by various agencies of the Department of Agriculture and other governmental departments. Upon presentation of surveys of specific areas and documented individual cases, some improvement in practices was obtained and many individual injustices were corrected. But progress was painfully slow and very spotty. With the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1965, all federal, state, and local agencies must end discriminatory practices as a condition to receiving federal funds. Compliance in some areas has been good, but in others delaying and evading tactics are being employed. Much work is yet to be done, and government agencies must quicken the pace of their enforcement procedures.

Equal Opportunity under Anti-Poverty Programs

Discrimination against the rural poor — Negro and white — is not the only factor that prevents them from taking advantage of the newer programs to end the shame of poverty in the United States. The stated requirement of most of these laws, including the Economic Opportunity Act, is that the program must be initiated at the local level. But when the local "power structure" is opposed to change, and when knowledge of these programs and how to apply for them is not available to the rural poor, the new "opportunities" do not come. That is why NSF's trained field workers are an essential bridge between government programs and the people who need them. NSF helps people learn how to help themselves through education and self-organization.

MEETING THE CHALLENGE

NSF has sought to meet this challenge in the field by continuing its Southern Rural Training Project; developing an emergency Farm Labor Counseling Program; and intensifying the program of its regular Southern field staff.

Southern Rural Training Project

The Southern Rural Training Project, established under a contract with the U.S. Department of Labor in mid-1964, has been extended to July, 1966. SRTP is designed to demonstrate that local leadership in poorer areas of the rural South, in cooperation with local institutions and organizations, can assist in developing effective training programs for the rural unemployed and underemployed.

The SRTP staff has helped set up sixteen projects in six states, in addition to giving technical assistance to other development groups. For a sampling, in Louisiana, one of the projects will make possible self-help housing and one will train farm workers. Another will serve recently released prisoners. In South Carolina, one project includes self-help housing for migrants, and another will provide adult basic education in an area where an NSF survey showed that 82% of the adults have less than an 8th grade education. In Florida, two projects will upgrade the professional skills of teachers and former teachers, most of whom are Negro and whose original teacher-training does not enable them to meet current standards. In Georgia, there are two On-the-Job Training projects being developed, one for child-care workers and another for trainees at the sub-professional level in a state hospital. Other projects are in Alabama and Tennessee.

Sponsoring groups for these projects vary widely and include a local school district, several predominantly Negro civic improvement associations, a State Department of Education, a local union, a local farm bureau, a state teachers' association, and several colleges.

A number of the projects provide training for seasonal and migrant farm workers during the off-season, and the people served range from jobless youth to middle-aged farmers in need of basic education and training. All trainees receive living allowances and supportive services designed to help them stay with the program to completion, often a difficult thing to do, especially for heads of families. Other projects being explored include one to spur cultural and economic development of two Indian tribes, and one to train professionals and sub-professionals for work with migrant farm families along the Eastern Seaboard.

Farm Labor Counseling Program

NSF has long opposed the importation of foreign contract farm workers, whose extreme poverty makes them willing to work for low wages, and whose presence has undermined the already substandard wages of America's farm workers. NSF therefore felt a responsibility to offer help to the Secretary of Labor in the first season after termination of the Mexican labor importation program. The Farm Labor Counseling Program was set up by NSF to advise unemployed rural workers about the availability of "criteria" farm jobs, that is, work under guaranteed fair labor standards. NSF representatives reached 13,000 potential workers in eight states, and approximately 1,100 were recruited for out-of-state farm work. These workers were also given information about other services the government employment bureaus offer. Many expressed strong interest in job training programs. More young people applied for Job Corps and other youth training opportunities than there were places available. This NSF program has given a "push" to the state employment services, which all too often discriminate against rural workers in the South, especially Negroes, whose daily farm earnings are in the neighborhood of $3 for a ten-hour day.

Intensified Field Work

The Southern Rural Training Project and the Farm Labor Counseling Program have been specialized extensions of NSF's work of bringing the knowledge and technical assistance needed by the rural poor to help themselves achieve a life of dignity through economic independence.

NSF's programs, carried on through workshops, conferences, individual guidance, distribution of fact sheets on government programs, and local meetings, have continued to expand. In addition to its field work in Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Tennessee, work has been initiated in Alabama and Florida. In four of these states, the field work is sponsored jointly by NSF, the Southern Regional Council, and the state Council on Human Relations. Some of the highlights of 1965 follow.

Cooperatives: Rural cooperatives have long contributed to successful farm operation, but the poor have rarely had an opportunity to participate in them. NSF's field staff has helped to organize local co-ops and aided several of them to secure federal loans to expand their services. The Panola County, Mississippi, Farmers Co-Op received a Farmers Home Administration loan of $113,000 to expand from its small okra marketing program into the much-needed supplying of fertilizers, insecticides, and farm equipment to its members. In Tennessee, a $49,000 Economic Opportunity loan was obtained for the Mid-South Consumers Oil Cooperative, whose impetus came when supplies were cut off from Negro farmers who registered to vote. Rural and low-income families in 13 counties of South Carolina have organized co-ops to obtain cotton pickers, combines, tractors, plows, sprayers, and other farm equipment.

Farmers Home Administration and Economic Opportunity Act Loans: If cooperatives have contributed to successful farming, supervised credit at reasonable rates has been the foundation of farm survival. Making such loans is the responsibility of the Farmers Home Administration through the expanded financing and more liberalized programs of the Economic Opportunity Act. Too often loans have been discriminatorily denied. NSF field workers have helped to prepare the applications and to appeal unjust denials. Following key cases in which NSF secured reversal of local loan rejections in South Carolina, 441 families (many of them Negro) have received EOA loans. NSF assisted 30 farmers in Louisiana to secure EOA loans for the first time. In Tennessee, over fifty FHA loans were obtained, including twenty farm purchase loans for former sharecroppers and tenant farmers.

Other Field Activities: Bi-monthly leadership training meetings are held in 44 out of 46 rural counties in South Carolina. A series of four multi-county workshops were held in Southwest Georgia to learn about government programs and how to organize Community Action Projects to fight poverty. Groundwork, through NSF's Farm Labor Counseling Program, has been laid for full-time work in Florida, to start early in 1966. Mass evictions of sharecroppers in Lowndes and Wilcox Counties, Alabama, show the need for an emergency housing program, and NSF is working on this. In cooperation with the Alabama Rural Areas Council, NSF called a statewide conference where the rural poor could confront representatives of the government agencies who are supposed to aid them. (Held at Montgomery, January 21-22, 1966, the conference produced a lively exchange of information and ideas, and plans for action.)

As a result of wide distribution of NSF Fact Sheets in Mississippi on the right of all farmers and sharecroppers to take part in Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Committee elections, Negro committeemen were elected for the first time — 27 in all. These local farmer committees determine acreage allotments and administer other federal agricultural programs; hence their decisions are of enormous importance to the survival of the small farmer. Numerous emergency loan commitments were obtained in Louisiana to repair Hurricane Betsy damage. Since most of them have remained unmet, NSF continues to press on this issue. In Tennessee, five farmers saved their land from auction by obtaining previously denied FHA loans.

LEGISLATION

For the first time in history, a minimum wage bill (H.R. 10518) including coverage for farm workers was reported favorably out of the House Committee on Education and Labor. The bill, covering some 1.3 million farm workers at $1.15 an hour, is expected to come up for a vote during the second session of the 89th Congress.

Other bills to protect farm workers, including workmen's compensation and coverage under collective bargaining laws, are expected to come before the Congress in 1966.

PUBLIC EDUCATION AND INFORMATION

NSF serves as an important source of public information on issues related to rural poverty. NSF officers and staff speak frequently at public and private conferences, such as a meeting of VISTA volunteer trainees, high school and college seminars, summer camp groups, and on TV programs. They also appear before legislative committees and at administrative hearings. A number of significant books which appeared in the last year drew upon resources provided by NSF. Material for articles and radio and TV programs is frequently supplied. NSF reports and releases are sent regularly to newspapers, magazines, libraries, government and private agency officials, legislators, labor and church leaders, and other concerned citizens. An approximate total of 18,000 pieces of literature was sent out in answer to 500 requests in 1965. Labor, church, and other groups ordered quantities of materials to distribute through their own channels.

NSF SERVES ON A WIDE FRONT

Frank P. Graham, NSF's Chairman, served on a three-member advisory committee to the U.S. Department of Agriculture on policies to provide equal opportunity to all through USDA's Federal-State Extension Services. NSF Vice-Chairman A. Philip Randolph has been named honorary chairman of the White House Conference "To Fulfill These Rights." Its Executive Secretary, Fay Bennett, has been reappointed to the Secretary of Agriculture's Rural Areas Advisory Committee. NSF is in close touch with national developments and has access to appropriate officials as needed to report developments in the field, to suggest policy, and to follow up on complaints concerning local administration of federal programs.

NSF participates in the Citizens' Crusade Against Poverty; it co-sponsored a four-state conference on Cooperatives and Credit Unions, held in Louisiana; and it provided valuable assistance to other groups working with the rural poor.

ADMINISTRATION AND FINANCE

New members added to the National Sharecroppers Fund Board during the past year are Rev. Shirley E. Greene, Associate Director, Commission on Church and Economic Life, National Council of Churches; Dr. Anna Arnold Hedgeman, Coordinator of Special Events, Commission on Religion and Race, National Council of Churches, and author of The Trumpet Sounds; Dr. Vivian W. Henderson, President of Clark College; and Dr. Pauli Murray, attorney and author of Proud Shoes. NSF lost through death Board member Gardner Jackson, whose entire adult life had been devoted to the cause of justice for America's dispossessed.

NSF continues to grow as the opportunities for expansion of work in the South open under the impact of the civil rights revolution and the war on poverty. The number of contributors showed a net gain in 1965 of about 14 per cent, and total contributions increased by 18 per cent.

NSF grants were again made to the pension fund for aged members of the former Southern Tenant Farmers Union, and to the National Council on Agricultural Life and Labor, of which NSF is a member.

To carry on NSF's expanded program, about 350,000 pieces of educational and promotional material were mailed to prospective new donors. The following finance report is summarized from the certified audit which is available at our national office for inspection by NSF contributors.

INCOME: Contributions		$129,832.73
EXPENDITURES:
Program and Education
Grants to Other Organizations	$ 4,100.00
National Office Personnel (includes payroll taxes and employee benefits)	24,761.11

Dear Paul:

Thank you very much for sending us the $50 contribution from Miss Mary L. Dyckman of New Jersey which we have applied to the educational program of our Rural Advancement Project which is sponsoring the Alabama Conference for rural people in Montgomery. I am sure you have already received an invitation and a conference program. Nevertheless, I enclose another hoping very much that you find it possible to attend.

The program for the conference is a very significant one as I am sure you realize. This kind of confrontation of federal and state officials and rural poor of Alabama will surely produce good results in helping these families to achieve economic security and better living conditions.

We especially invite your participation in the Saturday afternoon session at which important Agriculture Department officials will discuss the crisis in rural America and what can be done about it.

Sincerely,

Fay

MEMORANDUM ON EVICTION OF NEGRO SHARECROPPERS AND TENANT FARMERS

TO: Executive Committee, Citizens' Crusade Against Poverty

FROM: Fay Bennett, Executive Secretary, National Sharecroppers Fund

Some 90 Negro sharecropper and tenant farmer families have been or are about to be evicted in Alabama. Similar evictions are occurring in Louisiana and Mississippi. Up to 12,000 evictions are expected in Mississippi alone by late spring.

Changes in agricultural technology, as well as emerging Negro voting power, have combined to accelerate the displacement of Negro farm and rural families, especially where they have the potential of becoming an important political force.

Immediate crash programs are necessary to provide temporary economic and physical security and to begin to plan for the future. We suggest:

1. The President should declare the areas where evictions are taking place equivalent to disaster areas and order the mobilization of all resources of government to provide immediate temporary shelter, food, and medical attention.

2. Plans should be made to use the pertinent Titles of the Federal Housing Act and EOA to build cluster-unit shelter communities to serve up to 400 families each.

3. Services including surplus food, counseling, and job and vocational training should be provided through a neighborhood house development center setting.

It is estimated that of the 900,000 Negro farmers once in the South, there are now 200,000 Negro farm operators. In the next 15 years, 150,000 will be displaced unless effective preventive measures are taken. In addition, there will be 350,000 white sharecroppers and tenant farmers displaced in the same period. It is estimated that there will be at least an additional 450,000 functioning rural families who will be displaced and who will need residences and opportunities.

For long-range solutions, a federal-state, public-private enterprise program of rural development will be needed to provide the jobs locally to stem the migration to the cities and provide a balanced urban-rural economy. A program of building up the physical facilities and providing the social services needed will in addition create most of the needed jobs in the area.

Providing doctors, dentists, nurses, outpatient clinics, schools, recreational areas, water and sewage systems, and vocational training will provide thousands of additional new jobs. It is estimated that within a ten-year period both the facilities and the services can be provided and 300,000 new rural jobs created annually. Funds to finance the programs will largely be returned by increased tax revenues from an expanded local economy. The alternative is far more expensive and wasteful of our human resources, and the nation cannot afford this.

PRESS STATEMENT ON MISSISSIPPI EVICTIONS

By Fay Bennett, Executive Secretary
National Sharecroppers Fund
112 East 19th Street
New York, New York 10003 Tel:GR3-0284

file

The spectacle of Air Force troops bodily evicting 110 impoverished men, women and children who had sought shelter from sub-freezing weather in an unused Air Force building in Greenville, Mississippi, is a disgrace to the nation.

The serious plight of these poverty-stricken people shows that immediate federal help is needed to prevent severe hardship and actual hunger.

Nor is this Mississippi situation an isolated case of need being met with indifference and callous treatment. Some 90 Negro sharecroppers and tenant farmer families have been or are about to be evicted in Alabama. A number of evicted families are now living in tents in Lowndes County, Alabama. Similar recent evictions in Louisiana were halted only when the Justice Department brought court action and obtained a temporary restraining order.

We estimate that thousands of poor farm families in Mississippi, Louisiana and Alabama (and perhaps in other Southern states as well), will be put out this winter and in need of emergency help. Other poor families who are permitted to remain in their dilapidated shacks are also in need of government assistance. City slums cannot absorb a further influx of thousands of impoverished rural families who are being pushed off the land through no fault of their own.

These people do not want a government hand-out. They ask for training programs and jobs (in addition to immediate food distribution to stave off hunger) so they can stay in their communities and work to better their lives.

We call upon the President to mobilize all necessary resources of government in order to provide immediate temporary shelter, food and medical attention for the dispossessed and the cold and hungry.

Meanwhile planning should be started immediately to provide jobs through building needed homes, roads, schools and health and recreation facilities in these rural areas. We urge Washington officials to respond immediately to meet these urgent human needs.

Mr. Paul Anthony
Executive Director
Southern Regional Council
5 Forsyth Street, NW
Atlanta 3, Georgia

Dear Paul:

We have been becoming increasingly concerned over the huge task faced by our regional office in Atlanta, under Jac Wasserman's direction, now that he has the added duties of providing training, guidance and supervision for four rural field representatives under our joint Rural Advancement Project, while none of the funds yet raised for this joint project have gone toward the expenses of the regional office.

Because we were so eager to move forward and establish the regional office in Atlanta to help Jac give closer supervision to the field staff, we jumped the gun as it were and opened our office there before the funds were raised to cover its cost, listed in the budget at $23,000. This has placed a great financial burden on the National Sharecroppers Fund which we can ill afford. I am sure you realise that Jac also supervises the field work of three additional field representatives on NSF's pay roll.

There is not only the question of finances to meet the minimum cost of Jac's operation, but there is a real need for additional funds for the regional office to finance the workshops, consultations, staff meetings, additional field travel, trips to Washington etc., to make our work more effective.

I am sure you are aware that there are greater increased demands for our services in Alabama and Mississippi right now while people are being evicted and need housing and other economic programs. Our office can help these people meet their needs but we do need more money to do the job right.

This morning I had a good talk with Deborah Cole of the Norman Fund about this and I believe she will place the matter of financing the NSF regional office under the joint program before the Norman Fund at its next meeting. Incidentally I met with Mrs. Cole, at her suggestion, following her telephone call to me on a related matter.

Next week I have an appointment with Les Dunbar about this and hope that the Field Foundation will also consider this matter. I enclose for your information a memo on the general problem of the evictions which was prepared for the Citizens' Crusade Against Poverty which their executive committee unanimously approved, and also our statement on the Mississippi situation.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Fay:

Just a note in response to your letter of the 24th. While it's fine with us, it is not necessary that NSF have a separate checking account for the Norman Fund grant. If you are doing it solely for that purpose, don't make extra work forsyourself.

Best.

Dear Ocie:

Thank you for the record you sent me with your recent note.

Enclosed is your severance pay check covering the month of May, less the $100.00 travel advance which must be deducted at this time.

Paul Anthony and I had lunch together when I was in Atlanta last week. He did mention that you had got in touch with him but did not know what might be done. I am sure you will hear from him if he has anything to suggest.

Mrs. Alice Spearman thought there might be a position in South Carolina. Why don't you write to her at the South Carolina Council on Human Relations, 1330 Laurel Street, Columbia, South Carolina 29201?

It might be possible for a job opening to develop with the Labor Department under their Farm Labor Service. I should think they might have need of more people working in their Louisiana office on farm labor recruiting. I will be glad to call Tod Potter, Director of the Farm Labor Service in Washington, if you are interested.

Another possibility is that something might develop with one of the training programs in Louisiana which have been set up through the Southern Rural Training Project. Why not get in touch with Frank Lapeyrolerie who is director of the training program at Reserve, Louisiana.

With all good wishes.

Dear Paul:

Enclosed is the latest Progress Report of our Southern Rural Training Project (financed by our Labor Department contract). Do read it. It is very exciting to know that so many valuable new training programs are being developed to reach low income rural people, many of whom are functional illiterates.

Sincerely,

Fay

SUBJECT: Progress Report No. 6, Southern Rural Training Project: National Sharecroppers Fund -- OMPER Demonstration Project No. 83-31-07 in Developing Job Training Programs among the Hard Core Unemployed and Underemployed in Southern Rural Areas.

Report for February, March, 1966

New project development and service to expedite the funding of proposals already submitted characterized SRTP's operations during the past two months. However, equally significant has been the funding of two additional EOA Title III-B projects (200 trainees total) and the approval for funding in April of a project (180 trainees) by the U. S. Office of Education. Therefore, six SRTP projects have been funded in the past four-month period and we anticipate funding of three other programs by the end of May.

Four proposals have been submitted during the report period: two to the Office of Manpower Policy, Evaluation, and Research (U. S. Department of Labor), one to the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training (Experimental and Demonstration program), and one to the Migrant Division (Office of Economic Opportunity). In addition, SRTP has participated in program construction on two other projects that have been submitted and considerable developmental work has already taken place on six EOA Title III-B programs and four OMPER E & D projects. It is a continuing challenge for SRTP to develop and to service through funding all projects with which we are associated.

I. EOA TITLE III-B PROGRAMS FOR MIGRANT AND SEASONAL FARM WORKERS

1. Programs Funded

MACTAD (Mobile, Alabama). Sargent Shriver, Director of the Office of Economic Opportunity, announced on March 30, 1966, a grant of $52,131 to the Mobile Area Committee for Training and Development, Inc. The funds will finance an educational and prevocational training program for 100 low-income, seasonally employed agricultural workers. Prevocational training follows the cluster pattern and is designed to raise the skills of the trainees who remain in agricultural work, and also to provide introductory training for occupations outside agriculture. MACTAD, Inc., has also applied for an OMPER E & D, and it is anticipated that some of the EOA III-B graduates will have their educational and skill levels raised sufficiently so that they may be eligible to participate in the MDTA project when it is funded. (See also Summary and Evaluation.)

Ferriday, Louisiana. The announcement of this program's funding was made on March 28, 1966. Basic education, prevocational training and supportive services will be offered to 100 low-income seasonally employed farm workers from Concordia Parish in the upper Louisiana Delta area. This program's approval marks the second funding of

SRTP-developed EOA III-B's for seasonal farm workers in Louisiana, the only such programs approved to date in that State. (See also Summary and Evaluation.)

2. Proposal Submitted

Fayette County, Tennessee. Fayette County is ranked the third lowest county in the United States by annual family income ($1,363), and the fourth lowest in per capita income ($470). The need for manpower development projects is obvious, and SRTP, through the sponsorship of the Fayette County Economic Development Commission (Leander J. Palmer, Director) and with the cooperation of numerous county officials, quickly developed this program which will offer basic education, prevocational training, and supportive services for a three-month period to 180 unemployed or seasonally employed persons. Among the criteria for entry into this program are: an annual family income of less than $1,000 a year and an educational level of less than sixth grade.

Prevocational training will be given in three clusters: (1) Agriculture, including instruction in small farm management, new and improved farming techniques, crop rotation, fertilizer preparation and application, machinery operation and minor repair; (2) building trades, such as carpentry, electrical work, brick masonry, and plumbing; and (3) homemaking education, with instruction on child guidance, home care of the sick, family hygiene, home management, sewing and clothing care.

This program should be especially meaningful because of the participation of volunteer professionals. As an example, Art Emory of the National Sharecroppers Fund will offer the trainees suggestions on credit unions and cooperatives. J. M. Nunnerly of the Farmers Home Administration will explain the availability of $1,000 signature loans to owners of homes and will assist persons who so desire to apply for the loans.

The development of this project is reflective of our recent SRTP efforts in the field of EOA III-B's. An area was chosen because of its low income level and lack of MDTA and OEO projects. Most persons, initially contacted, stated that the area did not have an off-farm season in the summer. Albert Newall, SRTP Tennessee Field Representative, consulted with a number of helpful persons in the State Agriculture Department, but evidence seemed to show a period too brief for a project. Further contact with local agricultural experts revealed that recent changes in the county's agricultural situation now easily allowed a three-month program in the summer (lay-by period). Local farm authorities estimated that there was now a 75 percent surplus of farm labor due to cotton acreage cuts and farm mechanization. Walton Sharp, SRTP's Louisiana Representative who developed the III-B's in that State, then was assigned to the project. He and Newall received an enthusiastic response to the prospects of a III-B program from the local CAP, farm workers, educators and various agency personnel. With the two Field Representatives operating in "high gear" and the Knoxville office giving priority to the proposal, a program was rapidly structured. A broadly representative Advisory Committee (including one-third representation of farm workers) was selected by the local group. At an early stage in project development, the Migrant Division of OEO was notified of our activity in Fayette County and Mr. Ken Vallis of that organization responded quickly by visiting in Somerville on March 22 to discuss the project with its sponsor. On the night of March 22, two weeks after Newall's initial inquiry, the EOA III-B Advisory Committee met and, after a thorough explanation and discussion of the proposed project by Mr. Vallis, Dr. Sam F. Parigi (SRTP Director), Mr. Sharp, Mr. Newall, and Mr. Palmer, the necessary OEO forms were signed. The proposal had been developed with haste, but not waste. The sponsor helped SRTP representatives "touch base" with local workers, educators, and governmental officials and SRTP also informed related state agencies of the program (Example: State OEO, State Department of Employment Security, which normally has a representative in Somerville one day a week, and State Vocational Education). The Fayette County project bids to be the first EOA Title III-B in Tennessee.

3. Projects In Advanced State Of Development

Dorchester, South Carolina. This project is to be sponsored by the Colleton-Dorchester Counties Development Corporation, the CAP agency for Colleton and Dorchester Counties. L. S. James, SRTP's South Carolina Field Representative, and Walton Sharp are developing the program which is designed to serve 120 low-income, adult, seasonally employed farm workers. Income statistics show that 49.6 percent of the family units in Dorchester County have annual incomes of less than $3,000. The program, as presently envisioned, will be a year-round one, with full-time education and prevocational classes during the off-farm season and education classes two nights a week during the farm season. Farm workers, educators, and representatives of related agencies have offered their cooperation and Ken Vallis of the Migrant Division met with the program's sponsor on March 17. Drafting work has begun on the proposal which will be submitted in April.

Tennessee Elk River Development Association (TERDA). On March 23, 1966, Albert Newall and Dr. Parigi of SRTP met with Mr. Cuyler Dunbar, Director of the COMET E & D; Mr. Ralph Mitchell, Executive Director, Elk River Development Association; Mr. Mark Whitaker, Director of TERDA; Mr. James Lemons, TERDA Program Analyst; Mr. Robert Marshall, COMET Elk River Director; and Mr. B. H. Cummings, a COMET OJT Supervisor, to discuss a successor program to the COMET Project which will soon terminate in the area. Various alternatives were explored in a full-day meeting and it was finally resolved that attention should focus on developing a rather distinctive EOA Title III-B for 320 "rockbottom" rural farm workers. A subsequent meeting to discuss the project has been scheduled for Knoxville in early April. TERDA is the CAP agency for a nine-county area of South-central Tennessee and will sponsor the program.

The genesis of SRTP's involvement in this project is interesting. Cuyler Dunbar had originally suggested that the Elk River group contact SRTP for assistance in project development. Thereupon, Mr. Ralph Mitchell met with Mr. Peter Pesoli, SRTP Field Coordinator, in Knoxville to discuss the Elk River's competency to sponsor and their desire for a manpower project. Subsequently a delegation from Elk River went to Washington to contact Congressmen and federal agency personnel about possible programs in their area. On this occasion, two Washington officials recommended to the Elk River delegation that they seek assistance from SRTP for their program development.

Thibodaux, Louisiana. Because of his developmental work in Louisiana, SRTP's Walton Sharp was invited to attend the quarterly Louisiana State OEO Conference in Baton Rouge. At this meeting Sharp was introduced and mention made of his development of the Reserve, Louisiana, EOA III-B. Subsequently a number of persons contacted him at the conference, including Lucien Caillouet, Director, LaFourche Parish CAP, who asked assistance in developing a III-B program. The project's development began shortly afterward, including the formation of an Advisory Committee on March 3, 1966, and a visit from Ken Vallis of the Migrant and Seasonal Farm Workers Division on March 23, 1966. It is projected that the program will reach 180 low-income, undereducated farm workers.

Thomasville, Georgia. Early SRTP explorations in Georgia revealed a need for manpower programs in the Southwestern area of that State. Alfred Morris, SRTP Field Representative, is developing this project which will have as its sponsor the Southwest Georgia Community Action Council, Inc., a CAP group representing thirteen counties. There is some question at present on the number of counties which will be served by the project, and consequently the number of trainees. Indications are that this EOA III-B will serve approximately 200 trainees, 100 in each session. To date, there are no funded EOA III-B's in Georgia.

4. Other EOA III-B Projects Being Developed

Alexandria, Louisiana. A CAP agency, which was to sponsor the project, has had some internal difficulties, so SRTP has arrested its program development until the dispute is resolved. It now appears that the different groups are reaching a compromise and perhaps a needed program can be developed soon to utilize the services of many capable volunteers who wish to help less fortunate persons in their area.

Elloree, South Carolina. Considerable "leg-work" has been done on this tentative project which will project SRTP into the self-help housing field. Complex problems concerning construction, legal titles, and work-sharing agreements will necessitate a delay in further project development until May. SRTP's staff is small and a decision had to be made to delay this time-consuming project so that other equally desirable projects could be submitted in April and early may.

Shiloh (Tennessee). A multi-county CAP agency (with several EDA counties included) has indicated a desire to sponsor an EOA III-B for approximately 400-800 persons. Extensive contacts with farm workers, county officials, and school representatives reflect keen interest in the program, especially in view of the fact that the sponsor was becoming disappointed because of the previous rejection of several proposals which it had submitted.

Dillon, South Carolina. Initial contacts have shown widespread interest in a year-round program for this rural area of South Carolina. Many of the farm workers contacted by SRTP Field Representative L. S. James confided that they had never been to school and they cannot read nor write. Sponsor: Dillon County Community Action Council, Inc.

State Of Florida EOA III-B. Alfred Morris has acted as a consultant to the State Office of Economic Opportunity in its development of a program to serve 2,500 trainees in nine counties of Florida. The proposal should be completed by the end of March and will be submitted to Tom Karter, Chief, Migrant Division, OEO in Washington. This program again demonstrates the cooperative relationship that SRTP has developed with state agencies.

5. Previously funded Projects

Reserve, Louisiana. One hundred and twenty trainees are actively participating in this project. Of the 133 persons receiving physical examinations, tuberculine time tests showed 42 positive, and follow-up examinations revealed that a few of these required medical attention. One unanticipated problem developed when the sponsor had difficulty in obtaining bonding because the project was only scheduled for a three-month period. SRTP's Field Representative learned of the problem and was able to arrange the bonding service.

II. COOPERATIVE RESEARCH DIVISION, OFFICE OF EDUCATION, H.E.W.

Approved For Funding

Project TEST. Project TEST has been approved for funding having cleared all review barriers. As related in Progress Report No. 5, the funding of the program was progressing much more slowly than anticipated. On March 1, we learned that the program had been transferred from the Division of Adult and Vocational Research to the Division of Elementary and Secondary Research. Subsequently it appeared, because of complications created by its having been transferred to another division, that the program would not be funded in the current fiscal year. (Our experience is that programs which linger from year to year tend not to be funded.) Mr. Peter Pesoli, SRTP Field Coordinator, then made a special trip to Washington on March 10 to expedite the program which is designed to upgrade the skills of 180 teachers in Florida who, despite having failed to achieve the minimum 500 score on the National Teachers Examination as required by Florida law, still have the potential and desire to remain in teaching. After conferences with Mr. Walter Mylecraine, Assistant to the Deputy Commissioner of Education, Dr. Lewis Bright, Associate Commissioner of Education and Director of Cooperative Research Division, and J. Ned Bryan, Officer in Charge of Curriculum Branch, in which Pesoli explained the urgency of the program and the funding technicalities which had been encountered, the SRTP Field Coordinator was told that the program was an excellent one and that it would be funded by the U. S. Office of Education. That same day the program's sponsor, the Florida State Department of Education, was notified by Mr. Mylecraine that the program had been approved. Upon the request of Dr. Joseph W. Crenshaw, Director of Instructional Services, Florida Department of Education, Pesoli went to Tallahassee, Florida, to assist in making modifications to the program schedule so that classes may begin on May 16.

Since the program's sponsor and SRTP have been informed that the project is ready for the formal signing, funding may reasonably be expected to occur in early April.

III. MANPOWER DEVELOPMENT AND TRAINING ACT EXPERIMENTAL AND DEMONSTRATION PROJECTS

1. Proposals Submitted In Reporting Period

Training Indigenous Persons For Sub-Professional Occupations (Jackson State College, Jackson, Mississippi). SRTP was requested by OMPER to contact Dr. Jane E. McAllister, Jackson State College, and assist in the development of an E & D program. Dr. Parigi met with Dr. McAllister and other interested staff members of the college on February 10. At this conference an earlier proposal draft by the college was discussed as were methods for expanding the program. After a full interchange of information and ideas, SRTP was given permission to draft a proposal for submission to OMPER. O. H. Simmons of the Mississippi Employment Security Commission was informed of the project and he, in turn, gave needed information to estimate training allowances. The proposal was quickly developed and hand-carried to Washington by the Project Director on February 24. A conference was held that day with OMPER officials: Mr. Seymour Brandwein, Director, Office of Special Manpower Programs, Mr. Charles Gilmore, Chief, Special Programs, Dr. Arenia Mallory, and Mr. Richard McAllister. At this conference tentative approval was given to the proposal and SRTP subsequently presented the final proposal to OMPER on February 24. The project will train 115 underpriviledged persons as "counseling interns" to fill the demand of governmental and private employers for social service personnel.

Since the proposal was submitted to OMPER, SRTP has discussed the proposal with State Employment Service and Vocational Education, and also Regional Employment Service and H.E.W. representatives. A target date for funding of May 1 has been set.

Mobile Area Committee For Training And Development (MACTAD, Mobile, Alabama-OMPER. Expectations for the funding of this program soared as a result of a conference at OMPER offices in Washington on February 24 between Mr. Gilmore, Dr. Mallory, Dr. Robert Gilliard (MACTAD), Father A. S. Foley (MACTAD), Mr. Jim Hendricks (MACTAD), Mr. Jim Blackburn (Employment Service), Mr. Pesoli, and Dr. Parigi. The checkered life of this project has been recited in earlier reports, but a positive turn occurred at the meeting when OMPER agreed to consider funding the entire "package" of remedial education, institutional training, and supportive services for 280 trainees. A target date for funding of May 1 was set at the conference. Because of the time that had transpired and the changed conditions, it was necessary to completely redraft the proposal. Before doing so, however, Newall and Parigi of SRTP met in Montgomery with Mr. Copeland J. Pace, Coordinator of Manpower Training, Alabama State Employment Service and Mr. C. S. Bilbro, Assistant MDTA Director, Alabama Vocational Education Department, on March 3 in order to coordinate the project revision with their agencies. On March 10 SRTP's Director met in Mobile to review the proposal revision with the sponsor, and the new proposal was submitted to OMPER by mail on March 16. Since that time SRTP has had introductory discussions on the project with Regional ES and H.E.W. personnel.

Bureau Of Apprenticeship and Training - MACTAD E & D. To complement and expand the MACTAD-OMPER E & D, a separate BAT-MACTAD E & D has been developed and submitted by SRTP. After a series of duscussions with various agency personnel at national, regional, and state level, SRTP concluded that the OJT component could be processed more easily if it were submitted as separate, but tied to the OMPER E & D. The design of this proposal is to seek funding of 100 OJT slots by BAT, but to have the entire administrative cost of the OJT development included in the OMPER-MACTAD E & D. The funding of the BAT-MACTAD E & D is, therefore, contingent upon the funding of the OMPER contract and the two contracts are scheduled to conclude on the same date.

Comment On Project Development And Servicing. These two MACTAD E & D projects have required a significant amount of SRTP staff time, but without that involvement the proposals would not be progressing. A rough summary of SRTP-MACTAD E & D activities during the past two months will perhaps illustrate what SRTP means by the term "servicing a project." Conferences have been attended specifically to discuss MACTAD E & D projects in Washington, Atlanta, Montgomery, and Mobile. Sixteen telephone conversations were initiated by SRTP on behalf of these projects, and at least eight telephone calls were received. In addition, fourteen letters were written to expedite the project. It is now hoped that the project is "on the way" and that correspondingly less SRTP time be required.

2. Projects In Advanced Stage Of Development.

Mississippi Forestry Project. This project marks another example of SRTP's "outreach service" to OMPER. On March 1, Mr. Gilmore of OMPER requested SRTP to undertake the development of a Mississippi E & D project which had the interest of the State Employment Service and the U. S. Forest Service. Consequently Albert Newall and Dr. Parigi met with Dr. Henry Taylor, Rural Community Development Service (U.S.D.A., Washington); Mr. C. M. Evenson, Regional Job Corps Coordinator; Mr. Dale Eaves, BES (Atlanta Region); Mr. Harvey Jackson and Mr. Fred Ungerer of the Mississippi Employment Security Commission; and Mr. Tom Forister, National Forests in Mississippi, on March 4 in Jackson, Mississippi. This meeting was an exploratory one, but in a second meeting, which was held in Jackson on March 14, a number of decisions concerning the structuring on the project were made, and agreement was reached on sending information to Knoxville so that a draft proposal could be written. Among the participants at this meeting were Mr. O. H. Simmons, Mississippi E.S.; Mr. A. P. Fatherree, Mississippi Director of Vocational Education; Mr. H. T. Huddleston, President of Summit Junior College; and Mr. Del W. Thorsen, Deputy Forest Supervisor, National Forests in Mississippi; and SRTP representatives. Upon the receipt of information from conference participants, SRTP drafted a proposal which was mailed to the concerned agencies on March 4. The proposal will be reviewed by these agencies and then a final draft will be submitted to OMPER. This is the first time that SRTP has participated with RCDS in project development, but it appears that such an association may be mutually beneficial.

Orleans Parish Prison. Program development has continued on this project and proposal drafting has begun. Some problems are being encountered on reaching agreement as to proper structuring of the program so that it will have the needed flexibility essential for a social and training center for released prisoners. One distinctive feature of the planned program is the extensive use of highly qualified professional volunteers. Representatives of the Louisiana Employment Service and Vocational Education Department have been kept abreast of developments.

3. Proposal Previously Submitted

Ability Development For Demand (ADD), Tampa, Florida. It has been decided that the University of South Florida will act as program sponsor rather than Tampa's Office of the Mayor. Reportedly, this decision was reached at a Washington conference of March 8, 1966. OMPER did not notify SRTP of the sponsor change, and our effectiveness in servicing the project has been impaired. Nevertheless, we are continuing our efforts in the program's behalf and it is our understanding that the MT-1's will soon be completed.

4. Other New Developments

Triana (Triana, Alabama). A meeting was held at the Pulaski-Cavalry Hill Rehabilitation Center on February 10, between SRTP's Peter Pesoli and Albert Newall, Charles T. Brandon, Chairman, Pulaski-Cavalry Hill Recreation Committee, Leon Frazier, President of Technical Assistance Committee, and Clyde Foster, Mayor of Triana. The purpose of this meeting was to explore ideas for making Triana a component part of the present Pulaski-Cavalry Hill E & D, which would strengthen the program of both groups. Additional information has been gathered which will speed the proposal development and Mr. Pesoli contacted the Huntsville E.S. Office to notify them of the contemplated activity.

Training School For Boys (Milledgeville, Georgia). The proposed sponsor for the project has had to decline further active participation because of recent changes at the institution. However, the contact person has agreed to cooperate if another sponsor wishes to conduct the program and it appears that a Georgia university will seek the project. If so, the program to provide training for child care workers will be altered to reflect the ideas of the new sponsor.

Test II Project (State of Florida). SRTP has delayed development of TEST II because of the frustrating problems of implementing TEST I. TEST II, which seeks to upgrade the skills of displaced teachers in related but non-academic fields, is designed as a companion proposal to TEST I and program development will now be renewed.

5. Previously Funded Projects

Austin Peay State College Project (COMET). COMET continues to function in a highly creditable manner, and good communications exist between Mr. Cuyler Dunbar, COMET Director, and the SRTP staff. Upon the request of Mr. Dunbar, Newall and Morris of the SRTP staff undertook OJT development for COMET on three days during the bitter cold wave of early February. Mr. Dunbar has also introduced SRTP staff to persons in the Elk River and Beech River areas of Tennessee who are seeking manpower programs to continue the work begun by COMET.

Loyola University Project (SEESAW), New Orleans, Louisiana. Active recruiting of trainees for the secretarial phase of the project to be held in Reserve, Louisiana, commenced in the latter part of February and the formal training began on March 21. Some difficulties are being encountered in finding adequate training facilities in Slidell, but the sponsor is optimistic that the program will start there, as planned, on May 1.

St. Mary's Dominican College Project (New Orleans, Louisiana). Classes for secretarial training and dialectic speech remediation began in early January. Mrs. Geoffray, Project Director, has related that trainees were keeping pace with the course outline, and that the majority, through individual efforts outside class, were ahead of schedule. The presence of counselors at the training site is credited with diminishing trainee problems. SRTP's Field Representative spoke to several trainees who were grateful for the opportunity of getting the training and enthusiastic concerning the program.

IV. ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY ACT (Other than Title III-B)

1. Section 206 and Section 207

National Sharecroppers Fund Proposal. SRTP's parent has originated the idea of a project which would not only provide technical assistance in project development, but also train rural persons to: (1) acquire sufficient technical knowledge to assess their community and individual needs, (2) develop programs (under EOA, Vocational Education Act of 1963, Elementary and Secondary Education Act, Manpower Development and Training Act, etc.) to meet those needs, and (3) carry out such programs successfully. SRTP assisted in drafting the proposal which was submitted to OEO in March. NSF has arranged a meeting with Sargent Shriver on April 6 to discuss the proposal and rural conditions. Several key board members of NSF, Miss Fay Bennett, Executive Secretary of NSF, Pesoli and Parigi are scheduled to attend the meeting.

2. Title II-B

Holly Hill, South Carolina. Our last Progress Report showed 375 trainees receiving adult education training, but the program has now expanded to 500 enrolees. State officials have told our South Carolina Representative that the program is especially successful because of the active support of local organizations.

V. OJT DEVELOPMENT

SRTP's OJT work has primarily occurred in Georgia, South Carolina, and recently in Tennessee. Our system of referring signed OJT-1's from area redevelopment areas to local BAT representatives met with varied results. In some instances the employer has been quickly contacted and the application processed. In other instances, several months have elapsed and BAT representatives have not established contact with OJT-1 signers. As a result of BAT-SRTP combined efforts, training slots have been approved for 62 persons under OJT provisions. SRTP's next Progress Report will contain a more comprehensive treatment of OJT activity.

See also BAT-MACTAD E & D under Section III.

VI. OTHER ACTIVITIES

1. Florida Migrant Center

Mr. Julian Morse, Coordinator of Migrant Education, Florida State Department of Education, invited SRTP's Field Coordinator to a meeting attended by a number of persons working with migrants on February 17 in Florida in order to discuss the possibility of establishing a center to train sub-professionals (and some professionals) working with migrants. As a consequence of this meeting, and subsequent discussions, it was decided to change the proposal site of this training from Florida Atlantic University to the University of South Florida.

SRTP has been asked by Mr. Morse to assist in the development of this program and a tentative meeting date has been set with officials of the University of South Florida. Some work has already been done by SRTP on a component of this program with Mrs. Minnie Fields of the Florida Migrant Education Office.

2. An article by the Project Director entitled, "The Tennessee Pilot Farm Management Projects" was published in the January, 1966, issue of the Employment Service Review.

3. Walton Sharp was instrumental in bringing together 20-40 students of the Louisiana State University Catholic Center with Mr. John Goodman, Director of the Medicare Alert Program. The students were thus able to render help where it was needed and, at the same time, became introduced to "Poverty Programs" in which they have an interest.

VII. SUMMARY AND EVALUATION

SRTP is extending itself to develop projects in all corners of the Southeast. During this reporting period projects have been funded in Louisiana and Alabama. One proposal has been approved for funding in Florida and additional workers were placed on OJT's in Georgia. One proposal has been submitted from Mississippi and another from that State is being reviewed by cooperating agencies before formal submission. In Tennessee, one project was submitted and projects in South Carolina and Georgia are in advanced stages of preparation.

The acceptance of our project by agency personnel seems to improve each month, and oftentimes SRTP has been asked or is recommended to participate in development of new programs. "Success breeds success" is an old adage, and with each additional funding, new requests are being made to SRTP by local sponsors for assistance in project development. Unfortunately our small staff of six is limited in the number of projects it can handle at one time. It is the staff's feeling that this healthy response to SRTP's activities is reflective of the need to more directly carry manpower projects to rural areas and to provide the "total service-package" indicated in this report.

The sponsors, SRTP (and marginal farm workers) were gratified by the funding of the two EOA III-B projects. However, the projects were funded later than expected which has resulted in considerable pressure being placed on the sponsor by applicants and potential staff interested in participating. The funding delays have also created problems of recruitment since few instructors can long afford unemployment and some trainees, who are temporarily employed during a short farm season, will miss the program which they heartily sought during the off-farm season. These funding delays were not encountered on the previously funded Reserve III-B which was submitted to the Migrant Division on December 3, 1965, and approved by OEO on January 24, 1966. Apparently a joint announcement is now needed from both OEO and the U. S. Department of Labor, and the ramifications of that joint announcement appear to have delayed the fundings of these latter projects.

SRTP's contract is due to expire on July 9. Given the fast pace of present project development, the new opportunities opening to us, and our desire to provide the maximum service possible, we are faced with the problem of maintaining the momentum of the Project, while at the same time providing for an orderly termination of our operation. The problem is compounded by the fact that SRTP does not wish to leave a number of potential sponsors dangling with half-completed developmental work.

NOTE: SRTP was given permission by Mr. Charles Gilmore to submit this report late because of the priority of project development in which it was engaged during the usual time allocated for drafting the Progress Report.

Dear Fay:

I am very sorry that your schedule prevented a visit yesterday, but it was a pleasure talking with you on the phone.

Following our conversation, I did check again with Al Ulmer on the participation or lack of it of National Sharecropper's Fund people in the Mississippi and Florida conferences. To my surprise, I learned that in the case of Mississippi James Mays, Lewis Black and Art Emery were all invited and did attend. The Florida meeting was attended by both Eugene Hagans and Hubert Thomas. In the latter instance we arranged transportation. In the Florida meeting LaVert Taylor and Lewis Black were also invited but found it impossible to attend. In both instances, Jac Wasserman was invited and knew about the meeting and its participants well in advance. Besides these there were, of course, others in the meeting who were well aware of the services and contributions of the Sharecropper's Fund. I wonder if you had known this, or were in my position of not realizing how thoroughly the Sharecropper's Fund was involved. Frankly, I don't think we could do much better in cooperating than that.

While we may never overcome, we shall certainly cooperate!

Dear Paul:

Thank you for your June 24th letter.

I have known about the co-op conference which was held in Mississippi and I knew that several of our field people attended and participated. In fact Jac Wasserman had been scheduled to speak but was prevented from doing so at the last moment because of his wife's illness.

I did not know about the Florida meeting on co-op self-help housing, but I did learn later from Jac that he was aware of the meeting and had been invited. Here, the fault is between Jac and me. Our own communications broke down because had I known that Jac was not able to attend the Florida meeting on self-help housing, we could have arranged for another one of our people to be present. Again, there is no fault with SRC on this point.

The main points I raised with you on the telephone when I was in Atlanta, and when we unfortunately were not able to meet personally, had to do with the field trip of Co-op League people, Al Ulmer and a special Co-op League consultant, and the subsequent report prepared by the consultant. I realise of course that SRC had nothing to do with preparing the consultant's report, but the point I raised was that in none of this had there seemed to be an awareness of the role which NSF has played in the matter of developing rural cooperatives in the South over the past five or six years, through cooperative conferences and through specific help of our field men in actually helping local groups establish going cooperatives in South Carolina, Tennessee and Mississippi. Actually the travelling team of Co-op League people did meet with our folks in those states, but it seemed to me that some mention of this should have been made in the final report and that this might have been done had Al Ulmer been aware of our earlier work in this field. I can't blame Al for not knowing since he is fairly new with the program and has spent the past several years overseas, and this is why I brought the matter to your attention. It seemed to me that perhaps he and Jac might have gotten together earlier in planning the field trip with the Co-op League people and in having them briefed about our work in this area. In no sense am I suggesting that there is any "competition" between NSF and SRC on these matters. My only desire is to set the records straight and to let the people who are working in this field know a little about what has been going on in recent years.

My final point raised with you over the telephone had to do with your report to the several foundations in requesting a renewal of their grant to the Rural Advancement Project to continue the work of Hubert Thomas in Georgia. Here you explained that the report was gotten up very hurriedly and you yourself commented that NSF's role in this three-way cooperative project did not get the attention it deserves. You will recall that you suggested that in future reports you would send a draft to me and Jac Wasserman so that we could add a paragraph or two from our close association with this work to round out the report. I know this procedure will help in strengthening the report.

I know that SRC will cooperate, and so will we, and altogether, we may yet someday overcome!

Sincerely,

Fay

P.S. You will be glad to know that we have just taken on a special Consultant on Project Development for the coming year. He is Walton H. Sharp who is just finishing up his year's work with our Southern Rural Training Project and is a real "pro" in helping indigenous groups in rural areas develop training and OEO proposals, in getting them approved and funded, and in getting the cooperation of all of the relevant government agencies. As soon as Walt comes to work with us, the middle of August, we will begin to plan an NSF/RAP workshop for field men in Atlanta at which Walt can spend two or three days with the men sharing his know-how and planning a schedule in the field with them to help them in developing projects with the local groups with whom they work.

Dear Mr. Anthony:

Enclosed, for your information, is the final report of the Southern Rural Training Project (SRTP), which, as I think you know, closed up shop at the end of July.

At the beginning of the report is a one-page summary that allows a quick review of the record of SRTP over the past year. I hope that you will be free to read this summary now and the remainder of the report when you have an extra bit of time.

As you know, Fay Bennett is on vacation leave for the month of August. I am sure that when she returns to the office she would appreciate receiving any comments you may have on the past year's conduct of the project or on the contents of this final report for the Southern Rural Training Project.

Dear Paul:

You may know that a NSF/RAP workshop will take place at the Atlantan Hotel beginning Wednesday evening, October 5, and continuining through Friday afternoon, October 7. We hope that all of the RAP field representatives will attend as well as the state Councils executives who can spare the time. I have also written about this meeting to Ed Stanfield and Al Ulmer.

At this workshop we will have the special assistance of Walt Sharp, one of the ablest field representatives of our Southern Rural Training Project, who will be available to work with the field men in the various states on developing training programs with local groups. Also Mike Kenney, Field Coordinator for NSF, will also be available to help local groups develop programs to improve their economic well-being. This means that Jac Wasserman in our regional office can keep in closer touch with the RAP program in the several states and provide more guidance and assistance.

Perhaps we can have lunch together on October 5, 6, or 7 to talk things over. Will you be free on any of these days?

Sincerely,

INFORMATION LETTER

Number 31 September, 1966

I. Organizing Farm Workers in Wisconsin
II. Farm Worker Organizing in Texas
III. News Bulletins

I. ORGANIZING FARM WORKERS IN WISCONSIN

"Those people are the most neglected in the state. A friend of mine does volunteer work for them; he says that they've never seen a dentist; that when they break a bone it heals any old way, just so they can go back to picking in the fields."
--An unidentified man, attending a rally of migrant farm workers in Wisconsin.

On August 14, 1966 about twenty-five cucumber pickers set off across the plains of central Wisconsin from Wautoma to Madison to protest their living and working conditions to officials at the state capital eighty miles and four walking days away.

The group, called Obreros Unidos (United Workers) is affiliated with the National Farm Workers Association in California, and headed by Jesus (who pronounces his name Jesse) Salas. A Stevens Point State University student, Salas comes from a migrant family who settled in Wautoma seven years ago and opened a small cafe. He was graduated from high school in 1961 and worked summers in state-sponsored education and social programs for the migrants.

The Obreros Unidos are making simple demands: a $1.25 hourly state minimum wage (at present the state law does not cover farm workers); representation on the 28-member Governor's Commission on Migratory Labor; accident insurance; sanitary facilities; better housing.

Participants in the march (who represent the 4,000 migrants who come to Waushara County during the summer months) encountered no real hostility during their journey to Madison. "One man even stopped his car, said 'good luck' and handed us a ten dollar bill," said the Reverend Anthony Dolski of the Green Bay Catholic Diocese.

Ranks of the marchers swelled to about 150 on the final day, as sympathizers including clergy and nuns fell into line. They were greeted at the steps of the state capitol by government officials, among them Joseph C. Fagan, chairman of the Wisconsin State Industrial Commission, which reports on wage conditions and adjusts wage scales for women and minors. Fagan spoke warmly of the marchers, and attached considerable significance to their dignified protest: "The biggest challenge you gave us, Jesus Salas and your brave band, is to have a human concern. Apathy in moral standards, due to preoccupations in living, in making a dollar, is a growing problem. You gave us for only a brief week the chance to look at something much better than what we have had for some while. And that is the chance to care about someone who is trying very hard to care about his own people."

An editorial in the Capital Times dated August 20, 1966 gives an excellent appraisal of the import of the march: "The migrants ask for a wage [$1.25] that barely breaks through the poverty line. Since Wisconsin prides itself on its social conscience and since exploitation of migrant labor is not a recent development, it seems reasonable to expect the state to pay its due bill with alacrity. The state, which accorded the march a proper dignity, will make a farce of that march if the migrants' petition is shunted, shuffled and referred. There should be no necessity for even the hint of the need for another march."

Wisconsin state law does not provide a minimum wage for farm workers at the present time. It is even doubtful whether the substandard wages set for women and minors by the State Industrial Commission (for women over 16, $1.10 an hour in areas with populations over 1,000; $1.00 in towns under 1,000; for minors 95 cents and 85 cents respectively) apply to migrant women and children.

Joseph Fagan said that if a case were found where men made less money than women working in the fields, his Commission could test the non-discriminatory clause of Wisconsin's fair employment practices law by questioning whether women could receive the minimum and not men. A series of hearings will be held this fall to determine public sentiment concerning a $1.25 hourly wage for migrant workers.

At least one large canning and processing company, Libby, McNeil and Libby, already guarantees its 400 field workers $1.25 an hour. Often Libby pays as much as half of this in deficiency wages to workers unable to pick $1.25 worth on the piecework basis used by other companies.

In answer to the inevitable grower charges that they are presently paying the desired wage, a University of Wisconsin graduate student, Mark Erenburg, who has been working on a wage study with migrants for three years, said that if the workers were making more than $1.25, the processors should not be opposed to paying them the minimum wage.

One of the demands has already been met: the migrants were enjoined to elect their own leaders to represent them on the Governor's Commission on Migratory Labor.

Increased interest has also been shown in improving housing conditions: Mr. Carl Kwasigroch of Middleton, Wisconsin, inspector for farm camps in four counties, said the housing code itself was deficient; it describes such details as screening and ventilation, but says nothing about walls and floors. "How can you possibly judge a dwelling unit?" he asked.

The march has ended, and no economic pressure or walkout is planned, but it took an 80 mile march on blistered feet to gain the state's ear.

II. FARM WORKER ORGANIZING IN TEXAS

> "I am doing it [marching] with my own heart, I have already wasted all my life in the fields. I don't want the new generation to struggle like I did...."
> --Reyes Alaniz (quoted from the Texas AFL-CIO News, August 20, 1966)

Starr County, Texas, scene of the most recent farm labor strike, is among the poorest in the nation: the average family income is $1,568, less than one third the national average. The migrant worker is the worst paid, worst housed and most backward in the four-county Rio Grande Valley. The only person lower on the economic scale is the Mexican worker from across the border.

The strike began on June 1, when 300 workers, with no support, picketed at the gates of La Casita Farms. The strikers, who numbered over 1,000 in late June, voted to affiliate with the California-born National Farm Workers Association, which recently received an organizing charter from the AFL-CIO, a preliminary step toward full membership in the labor federation. (Its new name is the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.)

The farm workers in Texas have never organized before. They are asking only "a decent wage for a decent day's work." The workers are demanding $1.25 an hour; at present the wage rates range from 40 cents an hour to a top of 85 cents.

Unlike the year-long California grape strike (one of whose leaders, Eugene Nelson, is in great part responsible for the Texas movement), the Starr County strike has received the staunch support of local priests who have spoken out time and time again on behalf of their impoverished parishes.

Father Henry J. Casso, executive director of the Bishop's Committee for the Spanish Speaking in San Antonio, had this to say: "The scope of the strike is illustrated by the fact that some of the poorest people in San Antonio, those migrant farm workers who live around Mission Espada, have contributed food and clothing to the strikers." (More than 10,000 pounds of food was shipped to the strikers by the Bishop's Committee during the first three weeks of the strike.)

Bishop Medeiros of the Brownsville diocese commented upon the significance of the strike in terms of human dignity: "Human labor is not just another commodity on the market; it is something which comes from the human person and confers dignity upon the product of his work. It cannot be bought or sold like groceries or farming tools, because something of the human person is stamped on his work, and we cannot buy or sell human beings."

According to Newsweek Magazine (September 12, 1966), "Neither the march nor its clerical support would be possible without the hard-headed leadership of San Antonio's Catholic Archbishop Robert Emmet Lucey, 75, who likes to recall that his father was a union man. When the strikers recently marched into Lucey's cathedral to offer a basket of melons and a bushel of cotton to God, he told the crowded church: 'We endorse and approve your demand for an hourly wage of $1.25....This objective of yours is a step in the right direction.'"

On July 4, a small group of the strikers began the 387 mile trek to Austin, Texas, to present their grievances to the Governor, and to ask him to call a special session of the state legislature to enact a $1.25 minimum wage law. Among the leaders of the march were Eugene Nelson, former picket captain of the Delano grape strike; Houston Baptist minister James L. Navarro; Houston priest,Rev. Antonio Gonzales; and San Antonio priest,Rev. Sherrill Smith. According to a report in the New York Times only about twenty-five marchers made the entire trip. Three of these were more than seventy years old, and one was eighty-three. Cesar Chavez, head of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, joined the marchers for an afternoon. The trip was made without incident; in several cities the mayors and city officials turned out to greet the marchers and in some cases offered their political support.

During most of their two months on the road the marchers were accompanied by a small grey burro with $1.25 painted in pink on his side.

Governor Connally paid a surprise visit to the demonstrators en route, and told them he would neither call a special legislative session nor be on hand to meet with them in Austin. Further, he urged that the rally planned in Austin be cancelled because marchers in other parts of the nation had caused "riots, bloodshed, loss of life and property." Father Sherrill Smith called the Governor's token visit "a slap in the face, a pat on the head, the great white father type of thing."

As the small troop marched through downtown Austin, Protestant and Catholic clergy, labor union officials, Negroes representing Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and local citizenry swelled the ranks to some 4,000 strong.

Hero of the two and a half hour rally on the Texas State Capitol steps, though not present, was New York Senator Robert F. Kennedy. Over 8,000 people shouted "Viva Kennedy" when a telegram from him was read to the crowd. At one point the participants chanted "We want Kennedy." The liberal Senator has increasingly articulated the cause of the farm worker in Congress and to the nation. He was present at Senate hearings held in Delano, California, and his reply to a charge that it would be impossible to devise a system of collective bargaining for farm workers has often been quoted: "If we can put a man on the moon by the end of the 1960's, it seems we should be able to work out such a simple problem for farm workers after thirty years of talking about it."

Thirty labor union leaders were present, and pledged continued support for efforts to organize the two million farm laborers in Texas. Nicholas Zonarich, head of organizing for the Industrial Union Department, AFL-CIO, said: "For the first time the farm workers have been united into the house of labor. We shall support you."

III. NEWS BULLETINS

1. The Congress finally approved amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act assuring for the first time some 400,000 farm workers (those who labor on farms hiring at least 500 man days of work during a calendar quarter) a $1.00 hourly minimum wage beginning February 1, 1967. The minimum rises to $1.15 in 1968 and stops at $1.30 in 1969. Sugar cane workers are included in the coverage, but local, temporary workers are not.

Senator Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) led a floor fight to include a provision regulating child labor in agriculture; although it was defeated, the final bill does contain a provision prohibiting the employment of children under 16 in "particularly hazardous" agricultural occupations.

While the bill is certainly an encouraging beginning in the efforts to bring farm workers into the mainstream of American life, it is important to realize the narrow scope of coverage: in the Rio Grande Valley of Texas, for example, where extreme poverty is the lot of nearly every worker, the federal minimum will not have any effect, for there are very few farms large enough to come within the provisions of the law.

2. The year-long strike of some 2,000 grape pickers in Delano, California, directed first at Schenley Industries and more recently at the DiGiorgio Corporation, has been a struggle for employer recognition of two farm unions. In April, Schenley Industries agreed to recognize and bargain with one of the unions, the former National Farm Workers Association, an independent grass-roots organization headed by Cesar Chavez. A satisfactory contract was signed several weeks later.

By mid-summer the DiGiorgio Corporation, largest grape ranch in the area, had agreed to hold an election to determine which union, if any, the pickers preferred. The issue was further complicated when the Teamsters Union saw a chance to take advantage of the unionizing efforts, and began signing up workers in the DiGiorgio fields. The election was planned for August 30, to be run by the American Arbitration Association.

It was feared that since the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, and the National Farm Workers Association would be listed separately on the ballot along with the Teamsters, the three-way ballot might lead to a Teamster victory. On August 22, the two farm unions merged into the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO; the new union has received its organizing charter, a preliminary step toward full membership in the labor federation.

1,343 farm workers cast their ballots a week later at the DiGiorgio ranches, and only 19 rejected union representation. The vote was overwhelmingly in favor of the merged union, as opposed to the Teamsters.

3. Oscar Gonzalez, head of an independent farm union in California, called a strike in the tomato fields of Albert Aguilar in the Santa Clara Valley on August 26. It is the first farm worker strike in the history of the valley.

According to the United Farm Workers Union, Aguilar laid off 200 domestic pickers in anticipation of the arrival of Mexican braceros later that week. Said Gonzalez: "We're going to make them obey the criteria for braceros." (In order to bring in Mexicans, a grower must first pay at least $1.40 an hour to domestics; if there is a labor shortage even at this wage rate, the grower can apply for foreign workers.) Gonzalez charged that Aguilar is paying only $2.50 a day to pickers.

One effect of the strike is that braceros may not be allowed in the fields if investigators from the state determine that the strike is valid.

4. According to the Los Angeles Times "California's gross farm income will soar to an all time high of more than $3.8 billion this year despite the dramatic and far-reaching changes made in the farm labor work force."

Dear Fay:

In response to your letter about our bill for copying of $89.80, we have an arrangement as a convenience with a number of agencies -- most though not all in this building -- that we will do copying for them at cost. This is actually less than cost since the billing does not reflect equipment rental and maintenance, nor staff time spent in the work.

The total costs of this courtesy to small agencies, which cannot afford adequate copying equipment, runs to several thousand dollars a year; an amount which SRC could not possibly absorb.

If NSF is unable to meet this expense, we can and will absorb it. However, in fairness to the other small agencies who do reimburse us for part of this service, and to avoide a precedent which we cannot afford, it will be necessary for us to discontinue this service to NSF in the future.

Sincerely,

Dear Paul:

We have received a bill from SRC for $89.80 for xeroxing copies of material in connection with our work in the southern region and in helping local groups working under RAP.

As you know, NSF bears the major responsibility for financing the regional office in Atlanta, and covers the salaries and travel expenses of Jac Wasserman and Mike Kenney who spend a great deal of their time in the field on our joint RAP program and in giving direction to the field men and local groups.

I wonder therefore whether it might be possible for the SRC to absorb the cost of our use of your xerox machine? This would be a great help to us right now when we are at a low ebb in funds and have yet to receive major contributions to our newly established tax-exempt Rural Advancement Fund.

With best wishes for a Happy New Year,

Sincerely,

Dear Paul:

I am sure you will be interested in reading the enclosed testimony presented by Mr. A. Philip Randolph before the President's National Advisory Commission on Rural Poverty.

Also enclosed are recent clips from The New York Times, in case you missed them, showing the growing desperation of sharecroppers and tenant farmers who are being driven from the land.

I hope you will note especially in Randolph's testimony the section beginning on page 8 showing what can be done and calling for a crash and massive program to meet the needs of the rural poor.

Sincerely,

Fay

Dear Paul:

I hear you have been on vacation and hope you get back to "the land of the free" before all hell breaks loose in the Middle East.

I especially hope you will be back in Atlanta during the coming week, because I shall be there on June 6 and 7 to attend part of the first week's training session of our NSF/OEO Project, and I would like very much to see you. I hope that we can have lunch together on one of those days.

It is a long time since we have talked about the Rural Advancement Project and where we go from here. There has been new interest expressed in having rural field representatives in Arkansas, Louisiana, North Carolina and Tennessee, and as Ed Stanfield will tell you, we have been having some correspondence with Elijah Coleman of the Arkansas Council concerning the possibility of our jointly sponsoring a rural field person in that state.

Since you are a reader, I enclose a reprint from the Employment Service Review which tells about the Project Seesaw (Special Extension Education for Secretarial and Agricultural Workers) developed through our Southern Rural Training Project.

Sincerely,

Fay

A Beginning for the Rural Disadvantaged in Louisiana

PROJECT SEESAW

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF LABOR: W. Willard Wirtz, Secretary
MANPOWER ADMINISTRATION

While some employers provide their own classrooms and machine shop training facilities, the first 12 weeks of tool and die apprenticeship usually take place in high schools or vocational schools.

A Beginning for the Rural Disadvantaged in Louisiana

Project Seesaw

"This is the first time I've ever seen my name on a paycheck. It's so beautiful I'd like to frame it. Now I'm a taxpayer." These were the proud words of a 25-year-old Negro woman whose life has changed radically. Abandoned by her husband and supporting four small children on welfare, she could not even get a job as a domestic, because of the labor surplus in her small Louisiana town. Now, she commutes 90 miles a day in her newly-bought Volkswagen to her secretarial job at Tulane University in New Orleans.

A 47-year-old Negro man who had known nothing but a life of part-time work as a carpenter or in the sugarcane fields repeats over and over, "This is the first time I've had a steady job in my whole life."

These are two of the 150 disadvantaged persons who enrolled in Special Extension Education for Secretarial and Agricultural Workers (SEESAW), an MDTA training program sponsored by the Institute of Human Relations at Loyola University in New Orleans.

The experimental and demonstration project was designed to provide men and women of four isolated rural parishes in southern Louisiana with marketable job skills, basic education, and personal development guidance to prepare them to get and hold decent jobs.

The force behind Project SEESAW is Father Louis Twomey, the dynamic director of the Institute and a member of the National Manpower Advisory Committee.

Father Twomey firmly believes that "the University should be involved in community problems. Something—not enough—but something is being done in the cities," he says, "but virtually nothing is being done in the rural areas." He believes that these disadvantaged must be sought out and helped to gain employment.

Federally funded and integrated, the project was a breakthrough for conservative St. Tammany, St. Charles, St. James, and St. John the Baptist parishes. Training was divided among 3 centers, 2 for training 90 women in secretarial skills and the other for training 60 men in welding and mechanical skills. At all centers, training lasted for 6 months and included basic education and classes in personal development and job information.

Most of the women had had some high school education, and some had graduated. But, this meant little as far as skills, because the schools are generally poor, especially for the Negroes. The men had about a fifth grade level of education and required more basic education than the women.

An age limit of 30 was set for the secretarial training, but exceptions were made for several older women who were anxious to enroll. Ambition was not centered in any one age group, for the men ranged in age from 16 to 66. The older men enrolled mainly because of a burning desire to learn to read and write.

Of the 150 who were accepted for training, 134 graduated. This is a remarkable record considering that for some trainees coming to school meant getting up before 6 a.m., coming as far as 60 miles, following a grueling schedule of classes from 8 a.m. till 4 or 5 p.m., and not getting back to their families until about 8 p.m. However, one of the training centers was purposely located in a suburb of New Orleans to force the women to get into the habit of commuting from their outlying communities. For some, the trip to school was the longest they had ever taken. One girl wrote in an essay during the first week of class, "My trip on the river road to the airline (highway) is an experience I shall never forget because it is the most drive I have ever did." The distance is about 30 miles.

One center which had enrolled only 30 girls had an extremely close-knit group. The women kept up each other's morale, and the center proudly graduated all 30—setting an unofficial record for no dropouts from a training program.

About 80 graduates of those actively seeking work were placed in jobs by 3 months after training ended at the first center, a month after it ended at the second, and a couple weeks after the third closed. In the last center, half of the 56 secretarial graduates had jobs only 2 weeks after they completed training and at a time when job openings are normally scarce. The majority had not expected to go to work until the beginning of 1967.

Many of those working are receiving pay beyond their wildest dreams. The secretaries are averaging more than $300 a month, and some are receiving nearly $470 a month. An example of the women whose dreams have come true is a young Negro girl in her twenties who had dropped out of school in the 10th grade to help support her younger brothers and sisters. Working as a maid, she had received at most $80 a month. After 6 months of training, she is a receptionist at Boeing and getting $410 a month.

The men, most of whom had known only seasonal work in the sugarcane industry for about 90 cents an hour, are getting a median of $2 an hour, and some are receiving as much as $2.50 an hour.

In addition to the personal benefits of the training, the project shook the foundations of some hardboiled attitudes. Located in vacant stores, a union hall, an education building of a white Methodist church, the integrated staff and trainees entered right into the middle of town activity and unassumingly went about their business. Although Negroes were in the majority among enrollees, one center achieved a nearly 50–50 racial balance.

It is a tribute to the project's success and to the communities that there were no bad incidents, even though one center, a former drugstore, had two sides of plate glass windows which almost invited rock throwers. The only show of opposition was a letter to the editor of one small town newspaper.

The writer complained that the program was taking away the fine ladies' maids and training them to work for the Government bureaucracy in Washington! However, a reply from the project's staff was also printed, and no further trouble ensued.

Townspeople came not only to accept the program but almost to resent the group's "quitting" when the training period ended. In one town, the head of the Chamber of Commerce became the program's staunchest supporter and hired one of the graduates as his personal secretary. People are already looking to the future. When one staff worker parked her car on the wrong side of the street, the local policeman spied her. "Lady," he said, "that'll be a fifty cent fine, and by the way, when is the next project going to start? My wife is interested."

The trainees got along quite well among themselves and formed strong friendships. The men formed on their own a club which met every 2 weeks to work out problems such as sinking morale. Even though school is over, the club is still going strong.

A superior staff was certainly a major reason for the program's success. In addition to center supervisors and teachers, each center had counselors and counselor aides, who ironed out individual and group problems. Each trainee was scheduled for an individual counseling session about every 10 days, and group sessions were held frequently. Besides keeping up morale and instilling self-confidence, the counselors visited homes of trainees who threatened to drop out, acted as marriage counselors, and generally became trusted confessors. One "water-logged" counselor reports countless trips to the drinking fountain, so that trainees fearful of coming to her office could approach her on a more informal basis.

In the men's center, a woman counselor organized a group of the men's wives which met regularly for films and discussions on such things as early marriage, personal health, and sewing instruction.

The number of graduates placed in jobs is remarkable for an area where prejudice in hiring is still very real and where the Employment Service does not exist. The staff works tirelessly phoning and visiting employers and arranging job interviews. Some employers have become very personally caught up in the project and have devoted much time to interviewing and setting up contacts with other employers.

In some cases, secretaries who have been placed are the first Negroes in their offices. Generally, employers describe the graduates they have hired as "working beautifully." They are competent, self-assured, and highly motivated.

Placement is a mammoth task in some cases. For example, among 48 men graduates, only about 5 have phones and about 8 have cars that run. It is sometimes almost impossible to contact those who live in isolated areas up the Mississippi River about job possibilities.

However, an intensive followup program is helping the staff keep in touch with graduates. Those who have not been placed are asked to come in to the center about once a week for counseling. The girls can brush up on their typing. Also, for 3 months after a trainee starts working, the staff keeps in touch through phone calls, and personal visits, and group meetings.

Safety precautions are stressed during the training course.

The key to community acceptance of the new project was community involvement from the beginning. Two centers had formal Community Advisory Boards of 18 to 25 people who met to discuss the project and offer advice. The members represented a cross-section of the community—ministers, teachers, businessmen, laborers. In all three areas, the staff sought advice and help from the townspeople and won their confidence and support. Everyone from the sheriff to the shoeshine man became a local public relations worker.

Persons such as the local Negro minister were instrumental in spreading the word about the project among people for whom the written word represents a society which rejects them and promises of help are only made to be broken.

In numbers, Project SEESAW made only a small dent among the rural disadvantaged of four Louisiana parishes. But, it was a success. An integrated, federally funded training project was a success.

In several Louisiana towns, the most common comment these days is "When does the next project start?" Momentum has picked up. People are aroused. A man who owns half of one town has generously offered one of his vacant buildings for the next project, and the exterminating man wants to know why everybody "quit" after only 6 months. Friends and relatives are marveling over Joe's and Mabel's success after they enrolled in "that program." An impression has been made. The ball is rolling.

Dear Paul:

After serving almost five years first as Project Director and more recently as Field Director of the National Sharecroppers Fund, I have resigned my job in order to have greater freedom to work on specific projects.

On and after August 1st, 1967, I will be available to work as an independent consultant to foundations, agencies, and local groups on projects involving community organization and development, and on all types of economic and related programs: cooperatives and credit unions; farm programs; housing; social welfare services; consumer education and action; etc.

For some fifteen years prior to my association with NSF, I worked as a marketing consultant specializing in market research and analysis, feasibility studies, and new product development. During the past 25 years, I have also been active as an advisor and volunteer worker to various organizations concerned with improving the social and economic conditions of the poor.

I have appreciated my association with you during the years that I have been with NSF. The friendship and cooperation of all the dedicated people with whom I have worked have weighed heavily in my decision to remain and work in the South, and I look forward to the opportunity of working with you again in the future.

Please note my new address on your records and continue to send me news of your activities, publications, and any other information which may be helpful to me in my new endeavor.

Sincerely,

Jac

Memorandum

To: Merlin Miller

From: Jac Wasserman

I regret that prior commitments prevent me from giving you any kind of detailed outline of what I think can be accomplished in a short-term (maximum 3 months) marketing survey with the deadline you gave me. I worked until 3 A.M. last night in an effort to finish off some work that had to be ready this morning and only have an hour or so to dictate this memorandum in time for you to take it with you to the meeting in Jackson.

Following are some very tentative thoughts of areas that I think can be profitably explored during a three-month period.

Problem:

a. To find reliable outlets that would be willingto enter into contracts with member cooperatives of the Federation (such factors as transportation costs, packaging, refrigeration, etc. will be considered in each case).

b. To determine which of the vegetables for which contracts can be obtained offer the farmer-producer the highest financial yield per acre.

c. To determine which of the higher yielding crops are best suited to the particular farmer cooperative and to then have each cooperative decide which crops they choose to grow. The information that I hope to develop would enable each cooperative to decide, depending on its resources (farm equipment and machinery, packing sheds, storage facilities, etc.), whether they would be better off concentrating on one, two or more crops. Their experience with growing particular crops and the technical assistance they will need will also have to be weighed in making their decision.

d. I also hope to be able to provide complete information on the market for feeder pigs and to look into the possibility of the cooperative leasing grazing land for cattle, as well as the economic feasibility for such a project.

e. To the extent possible, I will also try to evaluate the present operation of the farmer cooperatives and to make recommendations for strengthening their organizations .

I would be able to devote up to twelve weeks to this project between August 15 - December 15. I am leaving about one month free during this period for consultation on other projects. Following is what I estimate the budget would be for this project:

Consultant fee - 12 weeks x $300.00	$3600.00
Per Diem - 40 days x $16	640.00 (maximum)
Travel	1360.00
Secretarial and misc.	400.00
	$5000.00

Dear Vera:

I have been out of the office more than in it during the last month, and I am way over my head. We are just swamped in this office. That is one reason your letter to the Board on Blue Ridge has not gone out, norethe minutes of the last Board meeting.

Frankly, because we are short-handed here with all kinds of action "musts" you might want to go ahead and circulate the corrected copy of your article from New South to your personal friends on the Board. On the other hand if you will send us copies of your New South article, we can send it to our Board and I think we can get it out some time during the next week. Let me know whether you want us to do this, and if so do send along copies of the reprint.

We really would like to order a supply of your article to send to students and friends who ask for this kind of background material. Are the reprints available in quantity from New South, and if so what is the cost?

We have seen the November Esquire! That is quite a story by Bill Worthy. Since he mentioned us I am glad it was in the middle and not at the top or bottom of his list.

Do you have any plans for coming to New York over the holidays? If so, let me know, and I will be glad to turn over the keys to our little apartment on East 18th Street to you.

Best,

Fay

MEMORANDUM

TO: Fellow Participants in the Migration Symposium

FROM: Fay Bennett, Executive Director

Enclosed is a summary of figures we have on Agriculture Department payments to corporate farmers in excess of $500,000 each. We have a much longer list of agri-businessmen receiving in excess of $100,000, and an even longer list of those receiving between $50,000 and $100,000. Together, these total $121,835,441. You will note that four huge enterprises in California received in excess of a million dollars, as well as one in Hawaii.

I have written to Senator John J. Williams asking for figures showing payments to small farmers by way of contrast, and also to learn whether figures for 1967 are available. Several years ago, Senator John J. Williams gave us data on farm payments showing that while a number of corporate growers received in excess of $100,000 apiece, the vast majority of family farmers received an average of only $60.00 apiece. We hope to get comparable figures which are more up to date. When these come in, I will send you a summary.

I think you will also be interested in the enclosed statement I presented to the National Commission on Food and Fiber. This statement enunciates some of the basic problems and outlines what we consider to be a total program for eliminating rural poverty and its relation to the national welfare.

For release upon delivery in the United States Senate

JUN 29 1967

Statement of
JOHN J. WILLIAMS, U.S.S.

Mr. President, for the past several years the Administration has been giving lip service to a revision of our farm program whereby it would curtail the large subsidy payments which are being made to the corporate type of farmers.

Notwithstanding these fine phrases, however, each time that the proposal has been before the Congress to limit these subsidy payments not only was the Administration silent but it actually opposed the amendment which would place a limitation on the amount which could be paid to any one individual and which would therefore limit these programs to the benefit of the bona fide farmers.

As a result the size of the cash payments for land diversion has continuously expanded.

These subsidy payments to which we are referring represent payments under the soil bank and acreage diversion programs, etc.; that is, they are direct cash payments and are in addition to and not a part of any subsidy which the government may be making under the price support program to these same individuals.

In 1966 there were 5 farming operations which received a direct government subsidy in excess of $1 million each.

In 1966 there were 11 farming operations which received direct cash subsidies in excess of $500,000 but less than $1 million.

In 1966 there were 258 individuals or corporations operating as farmers who received direct cash payments of between $100,000 and $500,000.

In 1966 there were 936 so-called farming operations which received direct cash subsidies of between $50,000 and $100,000.

In 1966 there were 3939 individuals who received between $25,000 and $50,000 each.

A complete listing of all those who received in excess of $50,000 will be incorporated in the Record as a part of my remarks; however, I call attention to just a few of the more interesting situations.

The Department of Agriculture has classified two state penitentiaries as farmers, thereby making them eligible for direct subsidy payments. The Louisiana State Penitentiary collected a cash subsidy of $92,135 while the Arkansas State Penitentiary collected $122,090 as incentives to curtail their farming operations.

The State of Montana is classified as a farmer, and it collected $337,345 to curtail its farming operations.

The Texas Department of Correction is classified as a farmer needing government assistance, and it was declared eligible for direct cash payments totaling $288,911.

The State of Washington is another "western farmer" which collected $125,552 to curtail its farming operations.

Based upon these large payments it is obvious that the small family-type farmer is not the real beneficiary of our present farm program, but rather the Government through these large payments is in reality subsidizing an expansion of the corporate-type of farming operation.

The time is long past due when this program should be curtailed and these payments restricted to an amount not to exceed $10,000 for any one farming operation.

At this point I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the Record a list of the 1966 payments of $50,000 and over under the various farm programs.

In the recent past, food and fiber policy of the United States has been determined, for the most part, by a desire to control past and potential surpluses, and to keep farm income from the kind of decline that uncontrolled production appeared to involve.

But within the past two years, that kind of outlook (with which the National Sharecroppers Fund has always had some basic disagreement) has become untenable and a different objective must be substituted. The change has been caused largely by the discovery of two long-standing but unrecognized factors--world and domestic need for greater, rather than lesser, production.

The depletion of the huge granaries of both the United States and Canada to meet crucial food shortages in India and other underdeveloped areas as well as in Communist bloc countries focused public attention on the situation. A New York Times editorial of October 14 summarized the annual report of the Food and Agricultural Organization of the UN:

"Population is now outstripping food production, particularly in the developing areas. In the 1965-66 harvest year, the world's population jumped by seventy million while total food production was at a standstill. And in Latin America and Asia, per capita production actually fell back by 4 or 5 per cent, which means that millions are now living on the very edge of starvation." The United States and other exporting countries cannot forever make up the deficit in the face of rising population, but they must bear a very large share in the years during which production is being modernized elsewhere.

The second new insight which has come forth recently is an indirect result of the war on poverty, which has spurred the realization that underconsumption, rather than overproduction, is a problem in the United States as well. In both cases, need obviously encompasses more than grain for bare survival.

There is thus a real interrelationship between food and fiber policy and the problems of rural poverty. Past policy of planned scarcity was a powerful factor in driving hundreds of thousands of farmers out of farming and reducing others to marginal existence; and the poverty (and underconsumption) of farmers and other rural people was a major contributing cause for the belief that we had an overproduction problem.

Domestic and World Needs are Growing

Needs in the United States are, of course, limited by consumer capacity to buy. It is assumed that we are seriously committed to the war against poverty, and that therefore the income levels of the poor will be rising continuously. The 35 million of our people who live in poverty do not have adequate diets. About a third of them are children, and their need for clothing and other basically farm products, as well as food, is not only great but spiraling. Thus even if these percentages or estimates are faulted, their direction is surely correct:

> It has been estimated in studies by the Conference on Economic Progress that, taking into account both needed improvement in diet and population growth, comparing 1975 with 1964, domestic requirements for increased farm products require that > meat utilization should rise 27 per cent > dairy products, 25 per cent > fruits, 53 per cent > vegetables, 37 per cent > potatoes, 20 per cent
> wheat, 8 per cent
> cotton, 21 per cent.
> When desirable* export goals are combined with these domestic needs, the production goals for 1975 are suggested, in contrast with 1964, as:
> red meat, 35 per cent higher > dairy products, 46 per cent higher > fruits, 51 per cent higher > vegetables, 37 per cent higher > food fats and oils, 49 per cent higher > wheat, 31 per cent higher > corn, 56 per cent higher > cotton, 85 per cent higher.

Our problem is to so organize food and fiber policy that this essential expansion does not simply mean that the giants grow larger and the corporation profits fatter, but that the small farmers share in the production, attaining viability and an ever increasing portion of the American abundance they have done so much to create.

The Rural Poor

Half of all the poverty in the United States is in rural areas. The rural poor include an estimated 17.4 million people, 16 million of them living in families. Of these, some 10 million are nonfarm residents and 6 million live on farms. Of the 1.6 million unrelated individuals, 1.4 million are nonfarm residents and 200,000 live on farms. (Nonfarm people are included because many of them have been farm people and would like to be farm people again; and because their destitution contributes to the problems of the farming area as well.)

---

*Not including the Communist bloc, and not assuming that the whole burden of world shortages can be made up by the United States.

Four general groups can be distinguished among the rural poor, although they overlap:

1) The aged. More than one million poor rural families are headed by persons 65 years of age or older; in the South, one out of every four low-income families is headed by such an older person. For them, the need is for a guaranteed annual income, so that they may live out their lives in comfort and dignity. Raising their income level will, of course, also help to improve the economic level of the community.

2) The four million poor Negroes in rural areas. Although some of them belong equally in other categories, they have as a group, young and old alike, commercial and noncommercial farmers, suffered from the discriminatory policies of the Department of Agriculture. While white farmers were aided by federal loans and technical assistance to survive, become self-sufficient, and expand, their Negro neighbors were not.

3) The twelve million poor whites in rural areas. Many of these are in states outside the specialized knowledge of the National Sharecroppers Fund. Some are still sharecroppers and tenants in circumstances and deprivation quite close to that of the Negro rural poor. Positive initiative on the part of federal agencies to see that they know about the help which is available, but which has gone disproportionately to the larger farmers, is needed. To a greater extent than the Negro rural poor, however, they live in areas which must be redeveloped as a whole, rather than simply in terms of individual farmers. Farming may still be an economic alternative, but it will probably be specialized farming, such as timber.

4) Farm workers, including migrants, are chronically poor, but are the subject of a later session of this Commission and therefore will not be dealt with in detail here. It should, however, be noted that since this discussion does include the harvesting of labor intensive crops, such as citrus, which still require seasonal hired labor, both the supply and the condition of farm workers -- logically a part of the discussion.

The rural poor are poor not only in terms of the fact that their incomes fall below $3,000 a year (many, of course, below $1,000).

Rural people are poorer than urban people in living standards and in community services. They have worse housing; one third of it is dilapidated, in need of repair. There are fewer hospitals and doctors, less access to any medical services. Educational facilities are fewer, and their quality is lower than elsewhere. The educational level of the family head is often low. An illustrative breakdown of rural residents with 8 years of schooling or less is:

rural nonfarm white, 44.5%; nonwhite, 75.5%;
rural farm white, 52.4%; nonwhite, 83.6%.

With the decline of the small farmer, small communities have declined too, with stores and banks going out of business, so that depressed areas result, and, in turn, have less to offer the remaining residents.

But, despite the fact that poverty is more prevalent and more likely to be self-perpetuating in the rural areas, these areas, and their people, actually receive less federal assistance--even from the antipoverty programs--than do the urban areas. Efforts are now being made to redress the balance, but as of January 1, 1966, South Carolina had requested only 9 per cent of its authorized quota for fiscal 1966; North Carolina, 33 per cent; Alabama, 39 per cent; Arkansas, 44 per cent; Louisiana, 48 per cent; whereas an urban city like Washington, D.C., had applied for more than 461 per cent and received 300 per cent of its quota.

There is a double reason for this appalling discrepancy. The first reason is that poor communities--particularly in the rural areas--don't have the resources to draw up and follow through on the proposals needed to gain approval and funds for programs. They don't have the trained people; they don't have social institutions. Often they don't know what is available. Literally, they are too poor to get help. The second reason, unfortunately, is that local power structures have a vested interest in the status quo and very often they don't want federal programs which will advance the interests of the poorer members of the community.

Marginal Farmers and Federal Policies

National food and fiber policy should be examined to discover to what extent past policies may have contributed to this poverty, and to what extent future policies may aid in restoring prosperity to rural areas.

Food and fiber policy must be based largely on anticipated needs for agricultural products. So large a poverty group, if its members secured the purchasing power of average American consumers, would have considerable effect on the demand for agricultural products; conversely, prolongation of the poverty cycle and the exodus from the land would continue a depressing effect on the economy as a whole.

If expansion, and not contraction, is to be the future direction of food and fiber policy, then marginal farmers can make a real contribution, at the same time that they are enabled to move into the mainstream of the economy and cease being "marginal."

Experimental projects have already proved that marginal farmers given training in farm management and in crop diversification have been able to raise their incomes 60 per cent and more over a three-year period. Many more of these programs are needed, but first, small farmers must be kept in farming, so that they can profit by training.

In two of the crop areas with which this hearing is concerned, cotton and tobacco, federal allotment and subsidy policies have worked to the benefit of the large landholder and against the interest of the tenant, sharecropper, and small farmer. The mechanization and introduction of scientific techniques which have revolutionized cotton production in the last two decades are now being extended to tobacco, and the dispossession of hundreds of thousands of small cotton farmers will be duplicated in the tobacco areas unless action is taken in time. The large farmer can more easily afford to set aside a portion of his acreage and benefit from government subsidies, while the small farmer needs to keep all the land he can in what is his only cash crop. (This year's drop in cotton price, made to discourage production, hits the marginal farmer much harder than the large one.) The large farmer serves on and controls, for the most part, the county committees which determine acreage allotment and has the knowledge, as well as the power, to profit from its decisions, about which the small farmer, and especially the small Negro farmer, may know nothing at all. The large farmer can afford better to diversify his production, and he can more easily obtain loans and technical assistance from government agencies to do so, whereas the small farmer not only lacks the resources but may not know what is available and how to get the help to which he is entitled.

The whole effect is cumulative: the ability to secure the capital to mechanize in the first place; to secure greater government support through subsidies; to secure credit and technical assistance; to diversify. The large farmer starts in a favorable position which grows steadily stronger, while his poorer neighbor is unable to compete and drops behind, and his tenant or cropper is dispossessed as uneconomic. The differential is still greater between white and Negro farmers, who usually start poorer, who have even more difficulty securing help from federal agencies, and who often find local power structures specifically blocking their advancement.

Rural Poverty and the National Welfare

The impact of poverty on consumption has been mentioned already. It remains only to examine briefly the other side of the farm-population-shift story. Rural areas have declined as small business has followed small farmers into bankruptcy. But city poverty also is rooted in rural poverty. The direction of migration, both white and nonwhite, is to the cities, and above all to the largest metropolitan areas where they usually wind up in the slum and ghetto areas.

Between one third and one half of current unemployment has been attributed to the number of workers forced out of agriculture since 1953. Employment opportunities increasingly require specialized skills. Rural people are unfortunately unskilled, and usually less educated than their city counterparts. They cannot compete successfully for the diminishing number of low-skilled job opportunities.

Set against the rising costs of welfare, urban redevelopment, tax losses from people with no income, and the ameliorative programs aimed at reducing poverty, the costs of revitalizing the rural areas and striking poverty at its roots should be willingly undertaken. Food and fiber policies can help, or they can hinder. The following program is suggested:

1) Food and fiber policy must be planned in terms of an expansion to meet growing needs: increased consumption by the poor; increased consumption because of rising population; and greater attention to the needs of the large part of the world with which we trade.

2) Rural people should be offered a real alternative of staying or leaving farms and rural areas, with appropriate aid in either case.

3) The key to this assistance in either case (going or staying) is a vastly expanded program of education in the rural areas (which will, itself, provide many jobs and help in the restoration of blighted areas). This must start with adult literacy and include farm management and co-op management--the kind of training which will enable small farmers to contribute their share to an expanding agriculture--as well as technical and industrial skills needed alike for the building up of rural areas and for successful migration to urban areas.

4) The survival of small farmers should be a policy goal. The continued expansion of corporate farms should be checked by a ceiling on subsidies, so that federal aid is not given to absentee-owned farms with gross sales beyond a certain figure. Anti-trust laws should be enforced against food marketing monopolists, and an investigation should be made of corporate-owned farms with nonfarm interests. If the Department of the Interior and the Department of Justice continue to fail to enforce the acreage limitation provisions of the Reclamation Act, new legislation should be sought from the Congress.

Rural residents should be helped to buy land, both through the establishment of nonprofit corporations such as that originally recommended under the Economic Opportunity Act, and through a more active initiative by the Farmers Home Administration and the Extension Service.

Loan policy should be determined by what is needed for the farm family to reach self-sufficiency rather than by present capacity for repayment; an experimental grant program should be instituted, at least for a ten-year period.

Aid to cooperatives should be increased (i.e., Farmer Cooperative Service (USDA) field men to work with new or potential co-ops; widespread availability of training through land-grant colleges and Extension Service, not merely money) so that small farmers can better compete against large mechanized farms.

5) Farm workers should obtain equality of treatment with other workers. They should have the same minimum wage as industrial workers, the same right to collective bargaining, the same unemployment compensation. They are as much entitled to subsidized housing, independent of employer ownership, as are city workers. Their children need the same protections as other children, and special educational aids like those some deprived city children are getting. In view of the great mobility of the American people, and not just farm migrants, residence requirements should be dropped as a barrier to full citizenship and social rights.

6) Enforcement of the Civil Rights Act, particularly in terms of nondiscriminatory policies by federal agencies or where federal funds are involved, should be tightened. Federal funds should be cut off without delay where this will secure enforcement.

7) A healthy agriculture with emphasis on the participation of independent farmers cannot exist in a depressed area. Following the decline in the number of farmers and the migration of "surplus" people, small towns have declined and with them their banks, businesses, and whatever there were of social and cultural institutions. Each evil fed upon the other, and the final result has been that in the antipoverty program itself, the poorer the area, the harder it is for it to secure assistance. There are not trained local people to survey needs and write and follow up proposals, or local institutions to undertake them.

But in the rebuilding, each will help the other. The need for education, and the jobs and building possibilities involved, has already been mentioned. Add to this that at least a third of all rural housing is in need of repair or replacement; that one-fourth of rural homes do not have running water and one-third lack telephones; and the amount of work available--and potential new incomes going into the rural economy--becomes apparent. Raising the farm standard of living in the most basic essentials means a demand for goods and services that will bring dead towns alive and provide a basis for amenities that will help people want to stay.

But even this is not enough. Public services such as roads, hospitals, schools, libraries, water supply must be publicly financed. Along with meeting human needs, these will mean more jobs, more income--and more demand for food and fiber (for instance, a local market for truck produce alone will enable some small farmers to survive without the problems of competing in the outside market). Thus, the framework of added public services will make possible areas of industrial development which may be outside the scope of interest of this Commission, but which are essential to bring back the rural economy to a fully participating place in the American economy and its abundance. Just as rural poverty and urban poverty are inseparable, agricultural policy and general economic policy must be consistent. A forward-looking agriculture will protect and use its small farmers, both because they can aid in reaching essential goals, and because the national welfare demands it.

Dear Fay:

I will reserve Saturday, September 7 for your meeting. Needless to say, our facilities are available should you wish to make use of them.

It does occur to me, however, would not it be better for Jim Wood to represent us, since he attended the first meeting and is very interested in this matter?

Sincerely,

Dear Paul:

We are writing to you on behalf of Lewis Black, Slater King, Charles Sherrod, Leonard Smith, Robert Swann and Albert Turner to invite you to a second meeting to discuss next steps in setting up a trust fund or landholding company as discussed at the July 27 meeting in Atlanta to which you ~~attended~~ were invited.

The next meeting will be in Atlanta on Saturday, September 7.

It has been agreed that in addition to those who attended the last meeting (and those who were invited but who could not make it) we would also invite several representatives of interested foundations and some of the people who will be recipients of this land program, including persons who presently own their own land and others who do not own land.

We will write to you again shortly telling you exactly where and when the meeting will take place and enclosing a report on the July 27 meeting.

Meanwhile, please circle September 7 on your calendar and plan to be with us for this very important meeting.

Sincerely,

Dear Paul:

SRC's Special Report on HUNGRY CHILDREN is superb! Were that it were not so.

May we have a half dozen or so more copies? We will put them to good use.

This report is so special that I do hope you have sent a copy to every member of the House and Senate with a personal covering letter (the kind that letter shops do with a one-line fill in). I am sure that you have sent it to all of the government officials and other leaders of opinion who should be aware.

Dear Friend:

Enclosed are the minutes of our last meeting. I hope you will read them, especially if you were not there, since there was discussion and action on a number of important matters.

The date for the next meeting has not yet been set since a number of postcards were not returned expressing preference of dates. If you are one of those who has not yet replied, I hope you will return your postcard, addressed to Leonard Smith, Room 208, 5 Forsyth Street, N.W., Atlanta, Georgia 30303. The dates being considered are November 9, 16 and 23. Let us know if you can make one or all of the dates so that a date can be selected when most can come. The time will be from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.

At the next meeting there will be reports from the various committees on legal procedures, land acquisition, by-laws, fund raising, etc. We need your thinking in this program.

MINUTES
Land Program Meeting at Atlantan Hotel, Atlanta, Georgia
Saturday, October 10, 1968

The meeting opened at 10:30 a.m. Charles Sherrod acted as Chairman and Fay Bennett as Secretary. The following persons were present: Charles Sherrod, Constance Curry, William Peace, Mary Moss, Frank Lapeyrolerie, Slater King, Marion King, Shimon Gottschalk, Leonard Smith, Fay Bennett.

Leonard Smith reported that a conflict of dates prevented Father McKnight, Lewis Black and Albert Turner from attending. Father McKnight expressed his special regret at being unable to attend and his 100 per cent support for the decisions made re the leasehold concept.

An agenda was adopted and the meeting proceeded to hear reports from committees set up at the previous meeting.

Report of Legal Committee

Mary Moss and Fay Bennett reported on the meeting of the Legal Committee held at Max Delson's office October 9. Present were Max Delson, C.B. King, Mary Moss, attorneys, (and attorneys Louis Lauer and Donald Biederman associated with Max Delson's firm). Bob Swann was unable to attend and asked Shimon Gottschalk to attend in his place.

The Committee reviewed the four principles for the land association adopted at the September 7 meeting. These are to be incorporated into the legal structure. The Committee discussed whether to set up a land trust or a non-profit corporation. It was agreed that the non-profit corporation would be less restrictive than a trust which might necessitate getting Court approval on every transaction. It was agreed that six or seven Southern states would be checked out to determine where it would be best to file the incorporation papers. Donald Biederman and Mary Moss agreed to do this. It was further agreed that leases should be made directly from the landholding corporation to the individual farmers or settlers who will be living on the land. Any land held and used cooperatively would be leased to the cooperative. Discussion next centered on drawing up the necessary legal documents to file for incorporation and with the Internal Revenue Service to apply for tax exemption. Needed for this are a name for the corporation, a list of incorporators made up of individuals who have been with the planning of the group from the very beginning, by-laws, and a determination as to which state to incorporate in.

In explaining the advantages of a non-profit corporation as against a trust, it was pointed out that the corporation would be legally empowered to borrow money, and pay interest to acquire capital to buy land. Individual families would lease the land and pay a modest rent, which would be used to pay off the loans plus interest. It was suggested that the national board's function would be to develop the overall basic principles and set limits for the local group to provide a framework within which they would act; i.e., the community must be democratically controlled, etc. The Board would set up committees for specific jobs and employ staff. In discussing the make-up of the national board, it was agreed that the board should not be made up of representatives of organizations, but of individuals who would be selected for who they are regardless of whether or not they were with an organization. This corporation is not an umbrella organization, but has just one interest which it will promote on a strictly businesslike basis. In line with this, the Legal Committee recommends that the board and legal structure be developed as a sound, businesslike entity. Local people would be members of all local committees and consulted and involved in all levels of planning.

It was suggested that all leaseholders would be members of the corporation, pay a minimal dues, and vote for the national board. It was suggested that the first board might be chosen by the founding group in the absence of local membership. It was further suggested that the board should be geographically and otherwise representative of a cross section of concerned people.

A discussion of the Legal Committee report followed. Mary Moss explained in detail why a non-profit corporation would serve our purposes better than a land trust. She said a trust is more circumscribed by law and that it is in a fiduciary relationship with the beneficiaries. As such, the trustees of a trust often cannot take any action without permission from the Court. A trust would be set up solely to hold land or property for another stated purpose. A non-profit corporation would also be able to hold land but would have other advantages as well, such as being able to borrow money, purchase land, sell undesirable land, etc. Furthermore, she stated that it is easier to get tax exemption for a non-profit corporation.

> It was moved, seconded, and unanimously voted that we set up a non-profit corporation and apply for tax exemption for our purposes.

Name of Company

Mary Moss pointed out that it was necessary to select a name and a group of incorporators before drawing up the incorporation papers. The following names were suggested: People's Landholding Trust Co.; Southern Land Trust; Land Development Trust; Diversified Land Trust, Inc.; Communities, Inc.; Community Landholding Association, Inc.; New Communities, Inc.; National Land Development Association, Inc. In the discussion of a name it was agreed that the name should be short, not duplicate any other organization, and tell something about our purpose.

> It was finally moved, seconded, and unanimously voted that our first choice of names would be New Communities, Inc. and that a second choice would be New Rural Communities, Inc. (The second choice would be used in the event an organization already named New Communities, Inc. is in existence.)

> Following further discussion, it was moved, seconded and voted that a sub-title explaining the concept of the corporation would be used with the name. An exact wording for the sub-title was not adopted, but it was agreed that in concept it would incorporate the idea of "a non-profit association to hold land in perpetual trust for the permanent use of rural communities."

> After discussion of board make-up, it was moved, seconded and voted unanimously that all board members would be selected for their individual qualifications and not as representatives of organizations.

The By-laws Committee was urged to meet as soon as possible to draft appropriate by-laws to be used in incorporating New Communities, Inc. In response to a question, Mary Moss said that a de facto corporation is approved by the Court as soon as the Court determines that it does not duplicate another corporation and is approved. At that time, our organization is in business and can go ahead and operate. This process might take six weeks. Applying for tax exemption takes longer and might be accomplished in six months.

Miss Moss said that five incorporators are the usual number and that two must reside in the state where the incorporation papers are filed.

> After discussion it was moved, seconded and unanimously voted that all of the active participants in this organization be invited to become incorporators. At this point the names of all persons who have been invited to participate and/or who have attended meetings of the group were read. Of this group, the following seventeen persons were deemed to be active participants in the organization and to be invited to become incorporators of New Communities, Inc.: Godwin, Slater* and Marion* King, McKnight, Sherrod, Mays, Smith*, Swann, Turner, Ulmer, Peace*, C.B. King*, Max Delson, Mary Moss, Frank Lapeyrolerie*, Schimon Gottschalk, Bennett*. Starred names were present and accept. The other are to be contacted for their acceptances.
> Following discussion, it was agreed for the present to continue to send minutes to all those who have indicated an interest or have been on the mailing list.

Report of By-Laws Committee

Father McKnight, Chairman of the By-Laws Committee was not present and Charles Sherrod reported for the Committee that it has not met. It was agreed that Charles Prejean should be removed from the Committee since he is not interested and that William Peace be added in his place.

Report of Land Acquisition Committee

Leonard Smith, Chairman of the Committee, reported that he was present for a meeting but that no one else on the committee was able to attend. He said that three members of the committee were present at today's meeting and that he would meet with them today to catalog available land and make plans to go and look at available parcels.

Report of Fund Raising Committee

Fay Bennett, Chairman, reported that several members of the Fund Raising Committee had made preliminary approaches to foundations and individuals. Within the next few weeks several members of the committee expected to have further meetings with some of the foundations which have expressed interest. It was pointed out that in addition to seeking funds to acquire land, some expense funds would be needed immediately to carry on the work of this organization. (At this point Lamond Godwin and Ray Marshall came into the meeting as observers for the Ford Foundation.)

Committee on Permanent Organizational Structure

Charles Sherrod, Chairman, reported that some ideas on structure have been submitted to the Committee, but the Committee as a whole has not yet met. He said that the Committee would meet soon to make recommendations for the permanent structure and welcomes further ideas.

Letters

A mimeod letter from Charles Prejean dated September 17 and a memo from Bob Swann dated October 7 were mentioned but no action was taken because they were not addressed to the group.

Communications and Agenda

It was agreed that items for the agenda and communications for the interim board should be circulated to all members in advance of meetings.

Officers

Mary Moss said that it would be necessary to have officers and board members for the incorporation papers.

> Following discussion, it was moved, seconded, and unanimously voted that Charles Sherrod act as temporary chairman, Slater King as temporary treasurer, and Fay Bennett as temporary secretary, and that the temporary executive committee be made up of these officers plus the chairman of all standing committees, which include Father McKnight, Leonard Smith, and Bob Swann.

Operating Budget

> It was moved, seconded, and unanimously voted to request the temporary treasurer to prepare a six-month operating budget for which funds would be sought as soon as possible; and that in the meantime, we should attempt to raise approximately $2,000.00 for immediate operating expenses.

Board Members and Officers

> It was moved, seconded and unanimously voted that the board should consist of not less than seven or more than twenty-five persons. It was further moved, seconded, and unanimously voted that permanent officers should be a president, vice-president, secretary, and treasurer, and that the number of officers and exact titles would be left up to the attorneys to decide, depending on the legal needs of the organization.

Local Participation

A lengthy discussion ensued on when local people should attend and participate in meetings and decision making. It was agreed that Charles Sherrod, Al Turner, and others should invite and bring with them to the next meeting some of the grass roots people who are interested in this program.

Next Meeting

Possible dates for the next meeting are November 9, 16, or 23. A mail poll by the temporary secretary will be made to determine which date is most convenient.

It was decided that in line with policy adopted at this meeting there should be no identification by organizations of temporary board members. It was further agreed that all persons who have been on the mailing list to date would be invited to the next meeting and would be sent a copy of the minutes of this meeting to keep them apprised of decisions made.

Dear Paul: C

I have just read The Chickenbone Special and was much moved by Dwayne Walls' sensitive and penetrating story.

He tells the whole story, not only what happens to people, who become very alive human beings in his story, but the economics and all the rest. The only thing missing is why the tobacco allotments keep getting cut back to the point of no return.

Our board is presently making long range plans for our work. And thinking through what our focus should be, I think it would contribute to their understanding if they all read The Chickenbone Special and I would, therefore, like to order 35 copies.

One of these days I would like to talk with you to get your views on where we should concentrate our efforts in the next few years.

Sincerely,

Fay

NEWS FROM:

National Sharecroppers Fund

New York, N.Y. 10003
Alan Swenson, Administrative Director
(212) GR 3-0284

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

SOUTHERN UNIONIST TO DIRECT SHARECROPPERS FUND

Appointment of James M. Pierce of Charlotte, N.C., long-time union leader in the South, as executive director of the National Sharecroppers Fund has been announced by Frank McCallister, chairman of the 33-year old organization to aid the rural poor. Mr. Pierce succeeds Fay Bennett, executive director since 1951, who has resigned from the administrative post in order to devote full time to the Fund's educational and promotional programs.

A native of Oklahoma, Mr. Pierce has been a union organizer and international representative since 1949. He was one of the first to bring Southern whites and blacks into the same unions. Recently, as Southeastern coordinator for the AFL-CIO's Industrial Union Department, he supervised the combined activities of 25 national unions throughout the South and directed major campaigns to organize textile workers and migrant farm laborers.

He has also served as Southern director for the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees and the International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers. Long active in civil rights and anti-poverty work, he helped form liberal-labor-black coalitions in several Southern states and campaigned vigorously for the first black candidates to seek top public offices in North Carolina.

In announcing the appointment, Mr. McCallister said, "Jim Pierce's background makes him ideally suited to the challenging job ahead. His passion for justice, his empathy for the poor and oppressed, his energy and initiative, and his realistic grasp of what it takes to deal constructively with community problems have won him friends and supporters among all elements of the population."

Mr. McCallister also stated that it was "gratifying to know that Fay Bennett, our executive director for eighteen years, will continue to give us the benefit of her many talents."

Mr. Pierce stated his conviction that the Fund "has a major role in revitalizing rural America." He cited the need for greatly increased federal expenditures on programs for rural areas, as well as for fuller use of existing government programs. "But our main job is to help the people to organize," he added. "Only through their own efforts can they gain the power and self-confidence they need to effect the changes they and their communities must have."

The National Sharecroppers Fund, with offices in New York, Washington, and Atlanta, promotes rural self-help and organizing efforts and works for legislation to aid the rural poor. Its field program, operating mainly in the Southeast, is carried on by the Rural Advancement Fund, which Mr. Pierce will also direct. The primary emphasis of the program is to provide technical assistance to enable people in deprived rural areas to better their own lives through cooperative community development programs.

BYLAWS of

NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND, INC.

ARTICLE 1
Organization and Objectives

Section 1. The name of this organization shall be National Sharecroppers Fund, Incorporated.

Section 2. This organization is incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as a nonprofit membership corporation, with its princiapl offices being in the City of New York and in Washington, D.C. Other offices of this organization may be established from time to time within or without the State of New York, and the organization may qualify to do business without the State of New York, by resolution of the National Board.

Section 3. The objectives of this organization shall be to furnish technical and other assistance toward the amelioration of economic, social, and educational conditions among sharecroppers, tenant and independent farmers, migrant farm workers, and other rural poor, based on their self-expressed needs.

ARTICLE II
National Board

Section 1. The National Board shall be the governing body of the corporation. It shall consist of not less than five members and not more than 35 members. The members of the corporation shall consist of all the members of the National Board.

Section 2. Members of the National Board shall be elected for terms of three years each, one-third of the members to be elected each year. In the event of a vacancy in the National Board, the same may be filled for the unexpired term by the remaining members. Persons elected to the National Board in 1969 shall draw lots at the time of their election to determine which of them shall serve for one-year, which for two-year, and which for three-year terms. Thereafter, as the term of each individual member expires, he shall be re-elected, or a successor shall be elected, for a full three-year term.

Section 3. Not less than eight members of the National Board shall constitute a quorum, and any action taken by a majority at which such a quorum is present shall be the action of the Board. A mail vote of the Board shall be taken on any motion if requested by a member.

Section 4. The National Board shall have the power to appoint whatever committees it may deem appropriate for the implementation of corporate purposes, including an Executive Committee.

Section 5. A member of the National Board who has been absent from three consecutive Board meetings without a valid excuse may be removed from the Board by vote of the Executive Committee.

ARTICLE III
Responsibilities of National Board

In conducting the business of the corporation, the National Board shall, subject to the Certificate of Incorporation and these Bylaws:

a. Elect officers;

b. Appoint standing committees;

c. Establish policy guidelines;

d. Issue notes, bonds, debentures, or other evidences of indebtedness, including mortgages of or security interests in property of the corporation, as required in order to carry out the objectives of the corporation and as may be permitted by law;

e. Enter into leases, licenses, or other agreements for the use or occupancy of corporate real or personal property;

f. Purchase, sell, lease, exchange, mortgage, issue security interests in, or otherwise acquire and dispose of real or personal property or any interest therein;

g. Raise funds by loan, gift, or otherwise for corporate purposes;

h. Make grants and loans to other organizations when such grants and loans are deemed to further the objectives of the organization;

i. Employ and compensate necessary personnel to carry out the above functions; and

j. Exercise all other powers necessary and proper to the exercise of the foregoing functions.

ARTICLE IV
Executive Committee

Section 1. The Executive Committee shall consist of such number of persons, not more than nine, as may be elected thereto by the National Board at the Annual Meeting. Vacancies occurring between elections shall be filled by the Chairman of the National Board. Officers shall not serve on the Executive Committee unless elected to that Committee. The Executive Committee shall meet as often as necessary but at least every two months.

Section 2. The Executive Committee shall, subject to the Certificate of Incorporation and these Bylaws:

a. Be responsible for carrying on all business of the organization between meetings of the National Board.

b. Report all Executive Committee actions to the National Board in the form of minutes of meetings of the Executive Committee. Such minutes shall be mailed to each member of the National Board as soon as possible after the conclusion of each meeting of the Executive Committee.

c. Elect temporary officers of the organization, in case a vacancy occurs, to serve until the vacancy is filled by the National Board.

d. Serve as a nominating committee to the National Board for the purpose of nominating officers and Board members for consideration by the National Board.

e. Exercise all other powers necessary and proper to the exercise of the foregoing functions.

Section 3. Not less than four members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

ARTICLE V
Voting

At all meetings, all votes shall be viva voce, except for the election of officers and directors where ballots shall be provided. There shall not appear at any place on such ballot any mark or marking that might tend to indicate the person who cast such ballot.

At any regular or special meeting, if a majority so requires, any question may be voted upon in the manner and style provided for election of officers and directors.

At all votes by ballot, the chairman of such meeting shall, immediately prior to the commencement of balloting, appoint a committee of three who shall act as "inspectors of election" and who shall at the conclusion of such balloting certify in writing to the chairman the results, and the certified copy shall be physically affixed in the minute book to the minutes of that meeting. No inspector of election shall be a candidate for office or shall be personally interested in the question voted upon.

ARTICLE VI
Procedure of National Board

Section 1. The annual meeting of the National Board shall take place in April, May, or June, and notice of such meeting shall be given to the members at least ten days prior to the holding thereof; a continuation thereof may be held at any other date determined by the Board. Meetings may be held within or without the State of New York. Absence of one or more Board members subsequent to the roll call shall not result in the loss of a quorum.

Section 2. Special Board meetings can be called as necessary by the Chairman or by petition of twenty-five percent of the members of the Board. The National Board may make such rules and regulations covering its meetings as it may in its discretion determine necessary.

Section 3. A Board member may be removed after hearing upon not less than ten days' notice to all Board members when sufficient cause exists for such removal. The Board may entertain charges against any member. The nature and proponent of such charges shall be set forth in the notice of hearing. A member may be represented by counsel upon any removal hearing. The Board shall adopt such evidentiary and procedural rules for this hearing as it may in its discretion consider necessary for the best interests of the organization. Cause for removal may include, but shall not be limited to, consistent and wilful failure to attend meetings of the Board. If a member duly charged and notified shall fail to appear at the hearing, without having presented a valid reason for his absence, the Board may proceed to hear evidence and make decision in the same manner as if the charged member had been present.

ARTICLE VII
Officers

Section 1. The officers of the organization shall be a Chairman, Vice-Chairmen, Secretary, and Treasurer; however, the offices of Secretary and Treasurer may be combined. Other officers may be provided from time to time at the discretion of the Board. All officers shall be elected at the annual meeting, or any continuation thereof, for a term of one year or until their respective successors are elected and qualified. In the event of a vacancy in any office, such vacancy shall be filled by the National Board for the remainder of the term thereof and until a successor has been elected and qualified.

Section 2. The officers shall perform such duties as are customarily incident to their offices and such other duties as shall be directed by the National Board.

ARTICLE VIII
Amendments

These Bylaws may be altered, amended, repealed, or added to by an affirmative vote of not less than two-thirds of the members at an annual meeting. No alteration, amendment, repeal of, or addition to these Bylaws shall be adopted unless previously summarized in the notice of the annual meeting at which the proposal is to be considered.

ARTICLE IX
Termination

In the event the existence of this organization is terminated, all its remaining assets shall be transferred to one or more organizations which have been ruled to be exempt from federal income taxation under either Section 501(c)(3) or Section 501(c)(4) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, to be used by them exclusively for the purposes for which their exempt status was granted and for purposes similar to those for which this organization was established.

ARTICLE X
Rules of Order

Except as provided herein, Robert's Rules of Order (revised) shall apply to meetings of the organization.

National Sharecroppers Fund, Inc.
and Affiliated Organization
112 East 19th Street
New York, N. Y. 10003

Gentlemen:

I have examined the combined and individual Statement of Assets, Liabilities and Fund Balances of

NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND, INC.
(AND AFFILIATED ORGANIZATION)

as of December 31, 1971 and the related combined and individual Statement of Revenue and Expenses for the year then ended.

Revenue of all funds is recorded as received (on the cash basis, except for certain bequest receipts). Expenses are recorded as incurred (on the accrual basis.) My examination was made in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards, and accordingly included such tests of the accounting records and such other auditing procedures as I considered necessary in the circumstances. It was impracticable for me to extend my examination of contributions, bequests, and other receipts beyond tests of amounts so recorded in the accounts of the organization.

The Rural Advancement Fund of the National Sharecroppers Fund, Inc. was established by the National Sharecroppers Fund, Inc., effective February 16, 1966, as a tax-exempt charitable and educational fund pursuant to Internal Revenue Code Section 501 (c)(3). I have been informed that although the Rural Advancement Fund of the National Sharecroppers Fund, Inc. is considered as a separate entity for Federal tax purposes, it is nevertheless still a part of National Sharecroppers Fund, Inc.

In my opinion, the accompanying combined and individual Statements of Assets, Liabilities and Fund Balances and related combined and individual Statements of Revenues and Expenses, present fairly on the bases indicated the assets, liabilities, and funds of National Sharecroppers Fund, Inc. and Affiliated Organization, as of December 31, 1971, and the recorded revenues and expenses for the year then ended, in conformity with generally accepted accounting principles applied on a basis consistent with that of the preceding year.

Respectfully submitted,

George Stephen Brody

IN THE DAYS AHEAD

At the Washington conference, one staff member articulated her concept of NSF's role.

"We have to bring back the American Dream of the good life to rural people, especially to minority people but essentially to all."

To fulfill this role, NSF will continue to plant and nurture the co-op seed throughout 1972. Through the innovation of a legislative newsletter and frequent appearances by the rural poor themselves in Washington, it will try to focus a national spotlight not only on the problems of these neglected Americans but on the solutions. NSF will work closely with a coalition of other concerned groups as it plans to step up its participation on the political level, stirring interest in issues at the grass roots and supporting those legislators who are ready to participate in the renaissance of rural America. As director Jim Pierce puts it:

"We will work with Cesar Chavez, Ralph Nader, church groups, labor unions, down-home politicians, or any other group — as long as their efforts reflect the needs and desires of the Alabama tenant farmer trying to scratch out a future for his kids, or the Louisiana plantation worker who wants to do something better with his life than cut another man's cane for $1.65 an hour. We think there's a new wind rising in rural America and we want it to blow its message right through the halls of Congress. That's what NSF has been all about since it started. With the help of our supporters, that concern is going to produce real change in the demanding days ahead."

1971 REPORT

on the work of

NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND

FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF ALL AGRICULTURAL LABOR

NSF

SINCE 1937

. . . and its

RURAL ADVANCEMENT FUND

"In this America of our struggles and our hopes, the least of these our brethren has the freedom to struggle for freedom; where the answer to error is not terror and the respect for the past is not reaction; where the integrity of simple people is beyond price and the daily toil of millions is above pomp and power; where the majority is without tyranny, and the minority without fear, and all people have hope."

—Frank Porter Graham
(1886-1972)
chairman emeritus, NSF

The National Sharecroppers Fund, like the rural poor with whom it works, has learned over the decades to keep a tight rein on optimism. When you must live in a shack, work for a pittance, and skimp on your children's meals while the rest of the country is buying color TV and dieting, optimism is a luxury. So NSF and its Rural Advancement Fund have adopted the life style of millions of small farmers and migrants — work hard with the resources available, hope for the best, prepare for the worst, and endure.

Yet looking back on 1971 and planning for 1972, some optimistic reactions seem justified. Of course, it is still rough for the politically powerless black or Chicano tossed like a leaf in the migrant stream, still rough for the tenant farmer contracted to misery. Rich landowners fattening on exploitation get richer through federal subsidies, Congress only grudgingly legislates progress, and the urban public reacts fitfully to evidence of shameful rural reality far from well-filled city tables.

But NSF saw almost 35 years of labor bring an encouraging harvest in 1971, with another good crop possible in 1972. The yield was counted at a year-end assembly in the NSF Washington office. Men and women working both on rural projects and on national legislation gathered for a meeting that epitomized NSF's burgeoning presence — one foot in the fields, the other on the doorstep of Congress.

Workers who knew what it meant to nurture a farming cooperative through painful early years exchanged ideas with those who knew how to lobby, how to translate the needs of poor blacks in Louisiana into programs that might win the vote of a Maine or California legislator. They swapped experiences while sitting under "now" posters that proclaimed: "We are all passengers on Spaceship Earth."

As executive director Jim Pierce led discussions, the 1971 NSF pattern emerged: the coming-of-age of NSF-assisted cooperatives in Georgia and Virginia where massive point-of-impact help flowered in organic farming; growing involvement in farm labor organizing in the Florida citrus groves and community organizing in the pulpwood forests of Mississippi and Alabama; significant contributions to a variety of self-help projects in the sugarcane country of Louisiana; and, overall, an increasing demonstration that NSF was a force for rural reform to be reckoned with from the grass roots to the highest national policy-making levels.

WASHINGTON

NSF's legislative director John Wilson told the meeting:

"The rural poor are not going to survive alone. Co-ops have to be the economics of the future. So we must do two things: pull together the constituency of the rural poor and move reluctant politicians to a new plateau of thinking."

While field programs were pulling together those constituencies, the NSF Washington office emerged as the only organization lobbying full-time for every bill affecting America's impoverished rural millions. It brought cane workers up from Louisiana to testify on the Sugar Act which controls their substandard wages. NSF officials pleaded the case for co-ops before the Senate Subcommittee on Migratory Labor and lobbied for the National Health Security Act and for legislation to ban child labor on farms. But its biggest effort supported the OEO bill which would have created widespread child care facilities and through its Title VII would have provided vitally needed federal support for rural co-ops.

But occasional showers of Congressional approval became, in the long run, a legislative drought. The hardest blow was President Nixon's veto of the OEO bill (this was being resubmitted in altered form as this report went to press). Even in defeat, however, the effect of NSF's efforts was apparent. In the past, legislation like Title VII would have died in committee. This time, the Congress approved our cooperative ideal, and next time the White House may get in step with the times.

BURKE-HALIFAX

Three years ago in Burke County, Ga., and Halifax County, Va., there was little except privation and despair. Today, there are two growing cooperatives that may become models for future development throughout the South.

Stout buildings housing the machinery of modern agriculture have risen from fields where economically dead-end crops like cotton and tobacco left small farmers shackled to debt as their children fled a hopeless environment for an uncertain future in cities. Now, diversified vegetable farming with growing emphasis on profitable organic production encourages family stability, preparing a future where a farmer can get ahead instead of spending a lifetime trying futilely to catch up. The transformation was achieved through major transfusions of RAF/NSF funds and know-how to local people with the will to work out their destinies cooperatively. After soul-testing years when balky weather, variable management, and severe marketing problems tried everyone's resolve, these co-ops are now beginning to stand on their own feet.

In Halifax, one of the nation's poorest and agriculturally most backward counties, members of the Southern Agricultural Association of Virginia are enthusiastically following the organic trend in food production. Forty acres of prime quality organic squash and cucumbers went to market in 1971, and 100 acres of a wide variety of organic vegetables are planned for the coming year.

NSF and its field representative Charles Dixon worked hard to provide SAAV members with the right fertilizers and techniques for growing natural crops. Then, when the farmers showed they could do it, NSF made the all-important link-up with markets, learning in the process through trial and error that co-ops must look to marketing before the first seed is planted. Many natural food stores along the Eastern Seaboard eventually stocked the co-op's products and are clamoring for more.

In a heartening display of what cooperation is all about regionally, SAAV's success has encouraged its fellow-co-op, the Eastern Georgia Farmers Cooperative, to try organic crops in 1972. Its members, once yoked to cotton, have already demonstrated their ability to produce abundantly. Last year, over 2,000 acres of squash, cucumbers, and peas were marketed through the co-op, which now boasts tractors and irrigation equipment acquired with NSF assistance.

In an area where shacks and outdoor toilets are the rule, NSF field representative Don Blood has worked energetically to advance local plans to build Newburke Community. Newburke is the kind of "possible" dream that develops from the co-op experience after the crops are in. Some 270 acres of land were purchased with an NSF loan, to be used for a planned settlement where low-income rural people can live in harmony with both nature and the local economy. Technical experts from Georgia Tech have helped to map a community with decent homes, an industrial park, lakes, and recreation areas. Disheartening bureaucratic delays have held up construction, but now a loan from the newly established Housing Assistance Council will make it possible to develop the land by putting in a water system, paved roads, and fire protection and laying the groundwork for a central sewage system. The first houses can then start going up, with loans assured by the Farmers Home Administration.

Both co-ops aim for total community improvement through health programs, day care facilities, sewing and clothing centers, and counseling services. And they share their new-found blessings. Last summer, Burke loaned Halifax some badly needed irrigation equipment. Halifax supplies Burke with its hard-won organic farming knowledge.

And last fall, NSF arranged for representatives from both communities to visit the Walnut Acres organic farm in Penns Creek, Pa. There they picked up ideas, developed over a quarter of a century, for new food products that can be grown and marketed cooperatively. The Halifax community is also moving ahead with its own health council, organized with the assistance of development director Fay Bennett.

SOUTHERN LOUISIANA

The Southern Mutual Help Association, directed by Sister Anne Catherine, is an interracial group which works with rural poor people in eight Louisiana parishes (counties). For generations, sugarcane growers with potent political connections have exploited and controlled the lives of 5,000 black plantation workers, institutionalizing the nation's worst concentration of illiteracy (50% in some parishes) while holding average family income to $2,600 a year.

Two years ago, SMHA was formed to help these victims of exploitation to help themselves. Its "umbrella" of services, which depend on NSF for support, include a new health clinic, adult education programs, day care centers, a credit union for those the banks turn away, and all the myriad assistance that is needed in an area where families of four eat on $4.76 a week.

An important aspect of SMHA's work has revolved around the student-worker teams which have gone onto plantations, sought out people who need help, and drafted proposals to bring needed services. Federal grants that enable the sick to be treated without charge at the clinic and to bring the light of learning into bayou shacks are channeled through SMHA. NSF, whose vital support underpins all this activity, believes the plantation workers are on the threshold of new and productive lives, and that cooperative lessons learned in Burke and Halifax can be taught here.

TRAINING AND ORGANIZING

While NSF concentrated its resources on a few primary projects in 1971, it also assisted other important ventures. NSF cooperation and counsel is aiding Cesar Chavez and his United Farm Workers Organizing Committee in the demanding task of banding Florida migrants and seasonal farm workers into a union that can bring dignity and decency into the lives of the nation's most abused and neglected working class.

It also contributes to the Education and Training for Cooperatives group in Jackson, Miss., which is spreading the new gospel of co-op salvation all over the South. And NSF has given significant help to the dramatic struggle of the Gulf Coast Pulpwood Association to bring black and white woodcutters into union against mighty paper mill interests. The woodcutters, oppressed over the years by take-it-or-leave-it pay practices, joined hands across racial lines last year. They started from scratch by contributing nickels and dimes to build an organization that defies both segregationist tradition and economic exploitation by the mill interests. When the call for help went out from the woodcutters, NSF responded. It will remain a firm and dependable ally.

NSF has also assisted in special projects of the South Carolina Council on Human Relations, the South Carolina Human Development Coordinating

EDUCATION

NSF continues to distribute its publications throughout the 50 states and to some foreign countries. For the 25th straight year, its annual report on The Condition of Farm Workers and Small Farmers was sent to members of Congress, key government administrators, libraries, schools, organizations, and thousands of individuals.

ADMINISTRATION

Four new National Board members were elected in 1971: Thomas C. Barnwell, Jr., organizer of the Hilton Head Fishing Cooperative and now director of a county-wide rural health program in Beaufort County, S.C.; D. Marshall Barry, economics professor at New College, Sarasota, Fla., and director of a student project to alleviate the problems of migrant and seasonal agricultural labor; Ivanhoe Donaldson, field representative for the Cummins Foundation and fellow at the Institute for Policy Studies, Washington, D.C.; and Raymond C. Wheeler, M.D., president of the Southern Regional Council and chief internist at the Charlotte, N.C., Medical Clinic.

Dr. Benjamin E. Mays, president emeritus of Morehouse College and president of the Atlanta Board of Education, continues as NSF chairman. Rev. A. J. McKnight of Lafayette, La., director of the Southern Cooperative Development Fund, is vice chairman, and Vera Rony, coordinator of equal

"We ain't no big thing... but we're growing"

The sign outside the co-op echoes the belief of the members inside.

"We Ain't No Big Thing But We're Growing."

The farmers were gathered at the headquarters of their co-op, the Southern Agricultural Association of Virginia (commonly called SAAV) in rural Halifax County. They met to consider participating in the most dynamic grass-roots program in the history of the National Sharecroppers Fund and its Rural Advancement Fund.

TURNING A CORNER

If SAAV approved the program, the cooperative and RAF/NSF would turn a critical corner. The two organizations had struggled side by side for three years in Halifax, one of the poorest counties in the nation. Out of their combined experience a new concept evolved that in 1971 would be tested in the fields of Halifax County, Virginia, and Burke County, Georgia.

The keystone of the concept was concentration of RAF/NSF's efforts in a small number of key areas. Major emphasis would be placed on communities where people of vision and determination had already started co-ops, where intensive development could bring about permanent change, where the struggle to save people bypassed by progress could be won.

ARCHITECT OF CHANGE

Jim Pierce, NSF executive director, came to the co-op meeting, bearing new ideas and some of the money to implement them. NSF could make available to SAAV not only guidance and technical assistance but also the capital it required in interest-free loans, to be repaid as conditions permitted.

"But money alone is never the answer," Pierce said. "People have to believe in their co-op, and they need a total approach that rehabilitates a whole community. That means jobs, housing, and health services that can give the farmer and his family a new lease on life and clear him from being mortgaged perpetually to second-class citizenship."

FROM ALL OVER HALIFAX

Fifty farmers were there early, sitting on folding chairs under a galvanized roof in the walled grading and loading shed of SAAV headquarters. Virtually all the faces were black, and there was not one that did not reflect the lifelong struggle to make a good life from the dwindling tobacco crop. Farewells to children fleeing what their parents endured showed in those faces, too. Eighty percent of their homes had no running water or indoor toilets. The co-op was their one hope for the future.

For the past two years, some of the farmers had grown good crops of cucumbers and sweet potatoes in fields that for centuries had known only tobacco. A few had made more money per acre with less effort than tobacco ever required. But too few acres were planted with the new crops, planning and supervision were inadequate, and marketing was handled through a jobber whose excessive profit-taking reduced the farmers' profits to almost nothing.

SOMETHING FROM NOTHING

Still, they could see signs of progress all around. The co-op's headquarters—a combination office, grading shed, and loading platform—had doubled in size in a year and now could handle heavy volume. There was a $20,000 credit union, vital for small loans in an area where banks couldn't see past tobacco loans. With RAF/NSF help, land had been purchased for future development. There was talk of sewing cooperatives, youth programs, feeder pig projects. Three years before, there had been nothing but hard times.

Pierce chalked plans and figures on a big blackboard. To grow the volume of vegetables that would induce buyers (like supermarkets) to back their big trailer trucks up to the SAAV loading shed, a larger acreage must be planted. In 1970, they had planted fewer than 100 acres. Now, he said, a minimum of 500—and preferably a thousand—should be in production. A murmur of surprise rose from the group. How?

TEN POINTS, THREE OPTIONS

Step by step, Pierce outlined a carefully worked out ten-point program for Halifax and Burke counties. Ultimately, the marketing program will include a chain of low-income farming co-operatives, ranging all the way from Virginia through the deep South, to extend the growing season and increase the volume of production.

Checkpoints would occur all along the way—all closely supervised by the co-op. The most important would develop an assured market by guaranteeing enough quality produce at the right time. The plan calls for a task force for training (Virginia Polytechnic Institute is supplying technical experts), locating and preparing the land, planting, cultivating, harvesting, processing, packing, and shipping. Every last detail is covered.

FIGURES ON A BLACKBOARD

Figures filled the blackboard as Pierce pointed out various options open to cautious farmers who wanted to choose how far they would go in the new program. Some could farm their own land, marketing through the co-op. Others could lease their land to the co-op, which would hire the labor and keep the profits.

The co-op itself would operate a demonstration farm beside the headquarters where lucrative specialty crops like strawberries and tomatoes could be tested in the rich Virginia soil. It also planned to use organic methods, to make the use of harmful pesticides, herbicides, and chemical fertilizers unnecessary.

The farmers considered. Could it work when so much they had bent their backs to and put their hearts in hadn't worked too well in the past? Hands rose with questions. Could the co-op keep machinery purchased by NSF? Yes, but SAAV would repay the purchase price from profits as it could. How would we know some jobber wasn't tricking us on market prices like before? SAAV would monitor the market, and the farmers would have contracts assuring them the going rate for their produce. Where can we find a thousand or so harvest workers?

DID IT SOUND TOO GOOD?

"I've been wondering about that too," Pierce conceded, and there was laughter over a problem mutually acknowledged. "Much of it can be local, from right here in Halifax. SAAV will pay decent field wages, and the money can stay right here in the county. Your teen-age children can earn clothing money for fall and winter, tuition money for school. Maybe if they see that farming and related enterprises can pay, some will leave off going away and set their roots here. That's what the co-op is all about—total community effort for total community gain."

Well, it sounded good. Maybe too good.

"Mr. Pierce," an older man said. "We know what tobacco can bring us, bad as it is. But has this new plan ever been tried?"

"I'm not going to try to talk you out of planting your cash crop of tobacco now," Pierce said. "After a year or two with the new program, I think you'll be talking yourselves out of it. And no, this plan never has been tried by a co-op like SAAV, because there never was enough capital to try it. Now we have some of the money to start with and faith that we can raise enough to keep going till SAAV can stand on its own feet. Then NSF can move on to another community with proof that what happened here can happen anywhere."

A DECISION IN HALIFAX

Do the farmers want to try? This is the crucial moment. The question is put to the membership, and every hand is raised.

"What I heard today changed my thinkin' right much," one man says. "I'm gonna be in there, pluggin' and pitchin'."

"I think we've turned a corner," Jim Pierce said after the meeting. "Here and in Burke County, too. The Eastern Georgia Farmers Cooperative, down there in cotton country, produced a small cucumber crop this past year, and now they'll be starting an expanded program same as here. Their co-op service station is paying its way, and the Newburke Housing Corporation is all set to begin building. But it all takes time and faith and hard work—and money."

Yes, money is needed. Money for machinery, for portable irrigation equipment, for trucks. Money to hire men with skills to manage, coordinate, and market this complex effort. Money that will be used over and over as the program expands and multiplies.

The men and women of Halifax and Burke are struggling, in a real sense, for their lives and the lives of their children. The people of the fifty states who have supported RAF/NSF over the years are in a position to share with them in a humanitarian vision that is on the verge of becoming reality. And in that sharing, they will become brothers under the banner planted firmly in the earth of Halifax.

HOUSE APPROVES OEO BILL— REPUBLICANS PREDICT SECOND VETO

The bill to extend the life of the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) for two more years was approved by the House on February 17, by a vote of 234 to 127. The bill is expected to come to a vote in the Senate sometime in late March. A conference committee made up of Senators and Congressmen will then meet to resolve differences between the House and Senate bills and decide upon a final form for the bill. The bill will then be sent back to the House and Senate for final approval, and on to the White House for the President's signature. Republicans threaten that if the bill goes to the President in its present form, he will veto it for a second time.

In terms of rural programs, the bill just passed by the House is not as good as the OEO bill vetoed by President Nixon in December. That bill extended present OEO Programs for two more years and also contained a comprehensive child care program, a new National Legal Services Corporation, and -- most important to small farmers -- a Community Economic Development Title (Title VII) that would have provided broad financial and technical assistance for rural cooperatives.

The bill vetoed by President Nixon in December stated that a cooperative with at least fifteen members and a majority of low-income persons would be eligible for financial assistance from OEO. This assistance would include all or part of the costs for establishing and operating cooperative farming, purchasing, marketing, and processing programs.

The costs which OEO would assist with would include, but not be limited to:

(1) administrative costs of staff and overhead;
(2) costs of planning and developing new enterprises;
(3) costs of acquiring technical assistance;
(4) initial capital where it is determined that the poverty of the families participating in the program and the social conditions of the rural area require such assistance.

It is essential that this assistance for rural cooperatives (Title VII) be included in the new OEO bill. Title VII is not in the House bill now, but it is in the Senate bill. When the OEO bill is considered by the House-Senate conference committee and the final form of the bill is decided upon, Title VII must be included.

WRITE YOUR CONGRESSMAN AND URGE HIM TO SUPPORT THE OEO BILL AND INCREASED ASSISTANCE TO RURAL COOPERATIVES IN THE FORM OF TITLE VII. EVEN IF YOUR CONGRESSMAN VOTED FOR THE BILL, HE MUST APPROVE THE BILL AGAIN AFTER THE HOUSE-SENATE CONFERENCE COMMITTEE. DO NOT TAKE HIS VOTE FOR GRANTED. WRITE HIM AS SOON AS POSSIBLE, AND URGE YOUR FRIENDS TO DO THE SAME.

Letters can be addressed to:

Congressman _____
U.S. House of Representatives
Washington, D.C. 20515

On page 3 you will find a list of Congressmen and how they voted on the OEO bill. You will note that only 44 out of 132 Congressmen in the sixteen southern states voted for the OEO bill. During the 1960's 1.4 million black people left the South largely because of lack of job opportunities. This bill, if passed and signed by the President, could provide these job opportunities through increased assistance to cooperatives, funds for rural housing, Head Start services, and other programs. But in the South, where poverty is more severe than in any other part of the country, only 34 per cent of the southern Congressmen voted for this bill. Let your Congressman know where you stand on this issue.

NSF has formed a coalition with 95 other social action organizations to push for approval of the OEO bill. An information clearinghouse has been set up in the NSF Washington office for groups or individuals who would like information on the bill or who would like to assist with the lobbying effort.

HEARINGS SCHEDULED FOR FAMILY FARM ACT

The House Judiciary Committee has scheduled hearings on the Family Farm Act (H.R. 11654) for the last week in March. NSF will testify at these hearings in support of the bill.

The bill is aimed at preserving the family farm and the small rural business. It would do this by preventing vertical integration -- the method used by large corporations to control the entire agricultural process. Many large corporations control smaller companies that provide all the components needed in agriculture -- production of seed, fertilizer, and insecticides; manufacture of machinery, processing and marketing of produce, and even supermarkets and restaurants where the produce can be sold.

This situation creates unfair competition for the family farmer. The Family Farm Act would not allow this to continue. The bill would classify any person, partnership or corporation engaged directly or indirectly in farming, and having more than $3 million in assets in a nonfarming business as a monopoly. This person, partnership or corporation would then have to release its holdings in agriculture or face prosecution as a monopoly.

NSF fully supports this bill. Large corporations are continuing to drive the small farmer out of rural America in large numbers every year. The Family Farm Act would help to reverse this trend and thereby revitalize rural America. The bill would not apply to charitable institutions engaging in agriculture for other than income purposes, or educational and non-profit organizations engaged in research.

The bill was introduced in the House by Congressman Abourezk of South Dakota. A similar bill has been introduced in the Senate by Senator Nelson of Wisconsin, but no hearings are scheduled there as yet.

HELP HIRED FARM WORKERS GET DECENT HOUSING

The President has frozen $3 million in funds which Congress appropriated last year for construction of farm labor housing. Write, wire or call the President, your Congressmen and Senators and urge them to work for three things: (1) to release $3 million in grant funds for farm labor housing being held by the Office of Management and Budget; (2) seek an additional appropriation of $30 million for farm labor housing grants for Fiscal Year 1972; (3) seek appropriations of $50 million for Fiscal Year 1973.

The Farm Labor Housing program administered by the Farmers Home Administration (FmHA) was greatly liberalized in 1970 by legislation introduced by Senators Mondale and Hart and Congressman Tunney. Now grants can be given to public bodies, broad-based nonprofit organizations, or nonprofit organizations of farm workers for up to 90 per cent of the costs. The remaining 10 per cent can be borrowed at an interest rate of 1 per cent for 33 years. This liberalization has greatly increased the demand on program funds. After six months of operation, there is already a backlog of over $18 million in grant requests, with only $3.7 million available. Incredibly, the President has frozen $3 million in additional funds which could help with some of the demand. More funds are needed for this Fiscal Year and far more are needed than are budgeted for next year.

Migrants are the most poorly-housed group of people in this country. There is no justification for freezing $3 million that could help to improve their housing situation. Senator Cranston and thirteen other Senators from both parties have already requested President Nixon to take the three steps mentioned above in paragraph one. Won't you join in this effort?

THE SHARECROPPER

* THE SHARECROPPER is a new publication of the National Sharecroppers Fund. It will focus on legislative developments that affect rural America -- with special emphasis on the small farmer, migrant and seasonal farm worker.

* THE SHARECROPPER will be an ACTION newsletter -- it is not intended to be a "one-way" publication. We will do our part by supplying the information on various issues concerning rural America. You can do your part by writing your Congressmen, Senators, or government officials and telling them that you support or oppose these issues.

* THE SHARECROPPER will not be an unbiased publication. We are biased in favor of the small farmer and farm worker and we feel that much more attention needs to be focused on rural America.

* THE SHARECROPPER will be published every two months and will be free of charge.

If you are interested in keeping informed about events concerning small farmers, farm workers and other rural residents, you will want to receive THE SHARECROPPER.

FARM LABOR SUMMARY

The House Subcommittee on Agricultural Labor, headed by Congressman James O'Hara, reports on action that has taken place on the following bills:

ELIMINATION OF CHILD LABOR IN AGRICULTURE (H.R. 10499) -- This bill would attempt to eliminate child labor by banning any child under the age of fourteen from performing farm labor except when the farm is owned by the child's parents. Children aged 14-16 would be allowed to perform farm labor only if it did not interfere with their schooling and if performed under safe conditions.

Hearings have been completed on this bill by the Subcommittee. It has been reported to the full House Committee on Education and Labor, but no action has been taken there as yet. NSF testified in support of this bill in September, 1971.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION FOR FARM WORKERS (H.R. 11007) -- This bill would provide workmen's compensation benefits to farm workers for partial or total disability or death due to any accident occurring in the course of their employment. It would also provide benefits for farm workers suffering disability due to pesticides. At present, farm workers are not covered by any workmen's compensation program. Hearings have been completed on this bill also.

CREW LEADER ACT (H.R. 13400) -- The House Subcommittee on Agricultural Labor will hold hearings on this bill soon. It amends the Crew Leader Registration Act of 1964 by making it apply not only to crew leaders who employ farm labor in two or more states, but to those who operate in just a single state as well.

Under the new bill, a crew leader who violates wage and hour laws, the Fair Labor Standards Act, or the Occupational Health and Safety Act could lose his crew leader license and be fined up to $2,500 or face two years of imprisonment. A crew leader is defined as any person other than a farmer, processor, or canner who, for himself or another, recruits, furnishes, hires, or transports ten or more farm workers for a fee in any calendar year.

Action has been taken on the following bill by both the House Committee on Education and Labor and the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

INCREASE IN MINIMUM WAGE (H.R. 7130 & S. 1861) -- This bill would raise the minimum wage for farm workers from its present $1.30 per hour to $1.70 per hour, effective January 1, 1973. Non-agricultural workers would be raised from their present $1.60 per hour to $2.00 per hour.

The National Sharecroppers Fund fully supports all of the bills mentioned above. We will keep a close watch on their progress through Congress in future editions of THE SHARECROPPER.

MINUTES
Meeting of National Board
NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND, INC.
followed by Meeting of Members of
RURAL ADVANCEMENT FUND
May 24, 1972
Washington, D.C.

The meeting was called to order at 1:00 p.m. by Vice Chairman McKnight, in the absence of Chairman Mays. Those present were:

Board Members: Thomas C. Barnwell, Jr., D. Marshall Barry, Robert S. Browne, Manet Fowler, Lamond Godwin, Shirley E. Greene, James Lipsig, A.J. McKnight, Robert J. Miles, Morris Milgram, Daniel H. Pollitt, Arthur F. Raper.

Staff Members: James M. Pierce, Fay Bennett, Antoinette Sabelhaus, Sheila V. Williams, John A. Wilson, Alice D. Wolfson.

MINUTES OF PREVIOUS MEETINGS

Action: It was voted to approve the minutes of the November 22-23 meeting of the National Board as mailed to Board members, while noting that the foundation grant obtained for the West Batesville co-op, reported on page 7, was $7,000 rather than $6,000.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE REPORT

Executive Committee Chairman Greene summarized actions taken at the January and March meetings of the committee, as follows:

It was agreed that surplus funds should be deposited in minority-owned banks. (A further recommendation on this matter to be presented later in this meeting.)

Continuation of outside appeal mailings on the scale of last year, if results in the course of the year appear to warrant, was approved.

Certain salary changes were approved and a revised budget of $363,020 was adopted. (Copies of the budget were mailed to the Board with minutes.)

A proposal by the Foundation for Community Development for Bertie County, N.C., was endorsed.

Appropriations of $5,000 to the Southern Mutual Help Association and $30,000 to the programs in Burke and Halifax Counties were approved, with the Director of Development instructed to raise additional funds for these programs.

The Executive Director was authorized to develop a moderate program of organic peanut production, even though to do so might involve a challenge to the allotment program of the Department of Agriculture and possible fines. (However, sufficient funds were not raised in time to start such a program this year.)

A proposal to purchase land for an experimental farm and training center for co-op management was approved provided a satisfactory deal could be worked out. (This matter to be discussed in detail later in this meeting.)

An attempt to encourate voter registration among farm workers in South Florida was authorized, preferably in cooperation with Frontlash and COPE.

The Executive Committee also met as Nominating Committee and would present recommendations for Board members and officers later in today's meeting. Meantime it asked that the Board name a committee to select candidates for the Executive Committee for the coming year.

Following Mr. Greene's presentation, the Board took this action:

Action: It was voted to receive the Executive Committee report. A committee, consisting of Mr. Godwin, Mr. Milgram, and Dr. Raper, was named to choose candidates for the Executive Committee.

Action: It was voted to approve the minutes of the January 27 and March 27 meetings of the Executive Committee as mailed to all members of the Board.

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR'S REPORT

Mr. Pierce presented a detailed written report on actions and activities since the last Board meeting, including a financial report. (A copy of the report is attached.)

Discussion of the report centered around the following specific topics:

Experimental Farm and Training Center: Mr. Pierce stated that RAF had been offered a contribution of $100,000 immediately, and more later if needed, to purchase a farm in North Carolina to be used as an experimental farm and training center for co-op management. The Department of Labor has indicated that it would finance the training. He felt that a North Carolina location would be convenient to both co-ops with which we are working, and that our program would supplement that of the Foundation for Community Development in that state.

Dr. Raper pointed out the need for efficient and skilled management and for a carefully worked out budget, calling attention to the large amount of work that would be necessary. He also proposed that a committee be asked to investigate various agricultural co-ops and communities such as Koinonia and to present recommendations based on their experience.

Dr. Fowler spoke of the need for a program design, as well as for staff and budget; she urged a clarification of the entire concept. Our purpose in acquiring land, she said, is not simply to run a plantation. We should base any program around the people involved; the emphasis should be on their sharing the crops. She recommended careful research on the feasibility of the whole plan, possibly financed with exploratory funds that might be sought for this purpose. Additional discussion centered around a motion made by Mr. Greene and amended by Mr. Lipsig. Mr. Pierce felt we should take advantage of the opportunity presented to us and buy land as soon as suitable land at the right price could be found.

Action: It was voted, in response to the Executive Director's report of the proposed contribution for an experimental farm and training center, to ask the staff to make provisions for a thorough feasibility study and a detailed project design for review by the Board as a basis for development of a farm-based experimental and training center, and to seek a developmental grant for this purpose. It was further voted to authorize the Executive Committee to act for the Board in this matter if the time element should make such action necessary.

Educational Film: Miss Bennett stated that the film being produced for us by Morten Parker had now reached the cutting stage. It is based on the experience of a family that has benefited from membership in the Halifax County co-op, contrasting this family with another that opposed the co-op. The question of how the film was to be credited was raised.

Action: It was voted to endorse the following credit line for the film: "Produced by Morten Parker with the cooperation of the Rural Advancement Fund."

Financial Report: The financial report for the first four months of 1972 (see page 6 of attached Executive Director's report) indicates that expenditures have been kept within the budget, but that the net balance on hand is very small. Actual income for these months was $15,000 less than the amount spent.

Mr. Pierce reported that the employee pension plan had not yet been launched; several plans are being considered in consultation with experts. The 1971 Audit is now completed. Several Board members proposed that a copy be sent to each member of the Board.

Action: It was voted to receive the 1971 Audit Report and to send a copy to each member of the Board.

Mr. Pierce stated that after the books for the second quarter year have been closed, a Washington auditor retained, and certain legal and technical matters settled, the financial operation would be moved from New York to Washington. Fundraising and publications would continue to be handled by the New York office, and contributions and other funds would be received there and forwarded as needed to the Washington office for payment of bills and other expenses. He requested passage of certain resolutions, already approved by the Executive Committee.

Action: It was voted to authorize the Executive Director to deposit a reasonable proportion of RAF-NSF funds in minority-owned and/or interracial banks or savings and loan associations.

Action: It was voted to authorize the Executive Director to proceed with bonding of all persons authorized to sign RAF-NSF checks. (A blanket position bond was suggested.)

Action: It was voted to authorize the opening of a checking account with the Union Trust Company of the District of Columbia in the name of National Sharecroppers Fund, Inc., and a separate checking account in the name of Rural Advancement Fund of the National Sharecroppers Fund, with two signatures required on each check on each account from among the following persons: James M. Pierce, John A. Wilson, Antoinette Sabelhaus, and Sheila Williams, with all checks for $1,000 or over requiring the signature of James M. Pierce or John A. Wilson.

Action: It was voted that checks for $1,000 or over drawn on the NSF and RAF accounts with the Amalgamated Bank of New York must bear the signature of one of the following: James M. Pierce, Fay Bennett, Alice D. Wolfson.

Discussion of the balance of the Executive Director's report, dealing with field projects, was deferred until later in the meeting.

Action: It was voted to receive the Executive Director's report.

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE DIRECTOR

Mr. Wilson presented a 5-page written report, including an outline of NSF's legislative goals as adopted over a year ago and developments within that framework since the last Board meeting (A copy of the report is attached.)

He noted that we have never had a sympathetic Administration since NSF's legislative program was started. The only bill we were able to push through, with the help of a coalition initiated by NSF, was the OEO bill, but the President vetoed it. Now the Administration's government reorganization plan threatens OEO still further.

However, Mr. Wilson felt that progress was being made, though slowly. NSF is now much more prestigious and influential than at the last Board meeting and is beginning to become the advocate for the rural poor that it was intended to be. By the time of the next meeting, there should be a farm worker minimum wage, a child labor law, and passage of a community Economic Development Title (Title VII) in the OEO bill.

There was discussion of the impact of rural problems on the problems of the city, and of the value of coalitions dealing with the common needs of the rural and urban poor. There is a strong urban lobby, which sometimes tends to pit urban interests against rural.

Action: It was voted to receive the Legislative Director's report with appreciation.

REPORT OF DIRECTOR OF DEVELOPMENT

Miss Bennett referred to her written report to the January 27 meeting of the Executive Committee, in which 1971 income from house mailings was reported as $99,650 and from outside mailings as $99,683. Income for 1972 was projected at $120,000 from house mailings and $100,000 from outside mailings, with an additional $90,000 projected from special contributions and bequests and $50,000 from foundations, making a total projected income of $360,000.

The special three-year development program outlined in that report has not yet been launched but hopefully will be after the film is completed and some model programs developed.

This year's edition of "The Condition of Farm Workers and Small Farmers" is about to come off the press, and a new issue of "Rural Advance" is in preparation. Miss Bennett recommended that we prepare a publication on land reform. She also suggested that NSF hold a public hearing on farm labor, similar to those held in February, 1959, and May, 1964, by the National Advisory Committee on Farm Labor; such a hearing would call attention to the issues involved and would provide the basis for another pamphlet.

Miss Bennett mentioned also her work with the Halifax County Health Council, which has conducted a sanitation survey and plans a nutrition program. It is hoped that the Reader's Digest Foundation will make a $25,000 grant for developing a health services model.

Mrs. Wolfson reported that, by the end of June, 484,000 appeals would have been mailed in 1972 to outside lists. (In 1971, 410,500 were mailed in the spring and 418,500 in the fall.) Returns are coming in well, but it is still too early for a definitive evaluation.

Action: It was voted to receive the report of the Director of Development.

ELECTION OF BOARD MEMBERS AND OFFICERS

The Nominating Committee recommended that the following National Board members, whose terms expire this year, be re-elected for a three-year term; expiring in May, 1975:

D. Marshall Barry	Marian Wright Edelman	Daniel H. Pollitt
Robert S. Browne	John L.S. Holloman, M.D.	Rowland Watts
	James Lipsig

The committee further recommended that the following persons, each of whom has agreed to serve if elected, be elected to the National Board for a three-year term:

George H. Esser, Jr., Executive Director, Southern Regional Council
LaDonna Harris, President, Americans for Indian Opportunity

Action: It was voted unanimously to elect as members of the National Board each of the persons proposed by the Nominating Committee.

Mr. Greene indicated that there were still two vacancies on the Board which the Nominating Committee recommended not filling until suitable candidates could be found. He asked that Board members be on the lookout for additional candidates. Dr. Barry suggested Annie Mitchell, of Clewiston, Florida, a farm worker active in the Florida Migrant Ministry and a leader in the local tenants association.

Action: It was voted that the nomination of Ms. Mitchell be referred to the Executive Committee and that the Executive Committee be authorized to act as delegate agency of the Board and to elect her to the Board if advisable.

The question of criteria for Board membership was raised, and it was stated that there are no explicit or stated criteria; candidates are selected on the basis of interest in the field and the collective judgment of the Nominating Committee as to their suitability for Board membership.

The Nominating Committee then reported that Vera Rony had indicated her desire, for personal and family reasons, to be relieved of her duties as Secretary-Treasurer. The Committee therefore recommended election of the following officers:

Chairman: Benjamin E. Mays
Vice Chairman: Robert S. Browne
Secretary-Treasurer: A.J. McKnight

Action: It was voted unanimously to elect the officers recommended by the Nominating Committee. (Terms of officers are one year.)

ELECTION OF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Godwin reported on behalf of the committee named earlier to select candidates for the Executive Committee. The committee recommended re-election of Robert S. Browne, Shirley E. Greene, William H. Johnson, James Lipsig, Benjamin E. Mays, A.J. McKnight, Vera Rony, and Rowland Watts, and election of Arthur F. Raper to replace James W. Lewis.

The Committee further recommended that the Executive Committee be enlarged from nine to eleven members and that an effort be made to add some younger people. It was pointed out that size of the Executive Committee could not be changed without an amendment to the bylaws, which could not take place until a year from now.

Action: It was voted to elect to the Executive Committee the nine persons proposed by the special committee. It was further voted that an amendment to the bylaws, to increase membership on the Executive Committee from nine to eleven persons, be proposed at the proper time for action at the next Annual Meeting.

DISCUSSION OF FIELD PROJECTS

Following an intermission for dinner, the Board resumed its deliberations with a discussion of field activities, based on pages 3-5 of the Executive Director's report.

Burke County, Ga., and Halifax County, Va: Each co-op is in quite good shape, owns some land, has markets for its vegetable crops lined up, and has an OEO management grant--though finding managers is still a problem for all co-ops. Our co-ops could do even better if processing arrangements were available for all their produce, since the fresh vegetable market is precarious and therefore more difficult for co-ops.

A Board member asked if NSF did not tend to spend vast sums of money on co-ops and then abandon them. In reply, it was pointed out that we try to stay with them as long as they want us; the final decision rests with the co-ops themselves. Last year there were extra expenses because of the need to buy a lot of heavy machinery. Our major contributions to co-ops may well be in the areas of management training, establishing a network of marketing facilities, and financial help. Since our financial resources are limited, we must continue to push for government aid to co-ops.

Another Board member raised policy questions in two areas: (1) Do we have a long-range program? What specifically do we hope to accomplish in the long run? (2) How do we see NSF in relation to the people in the local organizations? Are we serving them adequately as counselors and resource people at the local management level? Do we prepare them to continue on their own after we are gone?

It was pointed out that we do have staff members living in each of our program areas who are available to counsel (but not to dictate) and that experts from many fields are consulted frequently or brought to local areas for advice. Suggestions were made that we might form an advisory council and that we might elect a management expert to the Board to advise on managerial questions.

It was agreed that many approaches are needed to solve the many and complicated problems involved, that we cannot expect instant success, that even a little progress is to the good. The fact that our co-ops are better off today than a year ago proves that we have accomplished something.

Newburke Housing, Inc., Burke County, Ga.: There have been many problems, and it has taken two years to get this project going. But now it is moving ahead, and eventually, step by step, a whole new community may be built.

Southern Mutual Help Association, Abbeville, La.: The health program, which has a HEW grant of $200,000 per year for five years, is definitely a success, in spite of opposition from local physicians. It provides something that that part of the country has never had before. It has one full-time doctor, a pediatric nurse, a visiting dentist, and outreach workers to sign up members. Mr. Barnwell wondered if full advantage of existing government programs were being taken and offered to discuss the matter with Sister Anne Catherine. Meantime funds are badly needed for other SMHA programs.

Housing Assistance Council: This new agency, which already has made loans to Newburke and other groups, emphasizes loans to projects that cannot get funds anywhere else, especially for "low-low-income" housing. Mr. Pierce is a member of the HAC Board.

Foundation for Community Development, Durham, N.C.: The joint FCD-RAF program is still looking for suitable land to buy. A for-profit organization is to be set up, with the profits to be used for nonprofit community development.

Southern Cooperative Development Fund: Despite some problems with OEO and the Federation of Southern Cooperatives, SCDF has now accepted $650,000 in OEO funds, bringing its total funding to a little over $1,000,000. Nearly $300,000 has been given out in loans to 15 co-ops, and another $200,000 in loans has been approved.

Sea Islands, S.C.: Mr. Pierce has been working closely here with Mr. Greene and the United Methodist Board of Missions. There is a tremendous need for technical help, funds, marketing assistance, and general planning and organizing. Mr. Pierce helped to locate an excellent technical consultant for the area. Mr. Greene reported organization of a promising new Coastal Plains Human Development Coordinating Council, with which NSF might wish to get involved.

Other Areas: Mr. Pierce reported that he had attended a recent meeting in Epes, Ala., called by the Field Foundation, where there was discussion similar to ours today on how a better job of helping rural co-ops might be done.

UFWOC: Dr. Barry reported at some length on efforts of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee in Florida, taking issue with certain rumors to the effect that the movement there is made up of and controlled by Chicanos. "In fact," he said, "approximately 70 percent of the union members in Florida are black, 20 percent Chicano, and 5 percent white." While many of the organizers up to now have been Chicanos from California or white students, Dr. Barry said that the people who run the local union are black. Manuel Chavez (Cesar's brother) has left Florida, and the top man there is now Mac Lyons, a black farm worker from California.

Dr. Barry emphasized that a separate union of each ethnic group would result in no union, as each would be played against the other by the growers. Up to now there have been five separate farm worker organizations in Florida. What is needed is a national union, he declared, with research facilities, national publicity, and boycott committees all over the country to support it. A predominantly black union, such as the Farm Workers Union, would have none of UFWOC's advantages. This union, Dr. Barry stated, is now cooperating with UFWOC.

> Action: It was voted that, in view of NSF's deep concern about the unity and strength of the farm worker movement, we instruct the Executive Director to follow the Florida situation closely, to report to the Board any significant developments, to keep the lines of communication open with all groups, and to be prepared at their request to act in a mediating role.

NEXT MEETING OF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE AND NATIONAL BOARD

It was decided that the National Board should hold its next meeting on Monday, November 20, at 10:00 a.m., and that the Executive Committee should meet on Monday, September 18, at 10:00 a.m.

The meeting adjourned at 11:30 p.m.

MEETING OF MEMBERS OF RURAL ADVANCEMENT FUND

A meeting of Members of the Rural Advancement Fund of the National Sharecroppers Fund, Inc., was convened at 11:30 p.m. on May 24, 1972, with the following present:

Robert S. Browne, Shirley E. Greene, Robert J. Miles.

Action: It was voted to accept all reports presented to the NSF National Board at its meeting just concluded and to concur in all National Board actions relevant to RAF's purposes and program.

The meeting adjourned at 11:35 p.m.

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR'S REPORT
TO THE NSF NATIONAL BOARD
May 24, 1972

At the November 22-23, 1971, meeting of the National Board you instructed us to give priority to the following:

1. Develop a broader and more comprehensive legislative program and develop coalitions with other groups.

2. Strengthen our research department and make its services available to low-income groups and other organizations engaged in low-income programs in rural America.

3. Expand NSF's services and sphere of influence to areas outside the South.

4. Support UFWOC's efforts to organize the farm workers of the eastern section of the U.S.

5. Develop a long-range development program and secure funding for it.

6. Continue support to the Halifax and Burke projects and assist other groups when funds are available or could be secured from other sources.

In addition, the Executive Committee subsequently directed the following:

1. That we appropriate $5,000 out of un-earmarked funds to SMHA and that the Director of Development be instructed to make every effort to raise additional funds for SMHA.

2. That the Executive Director develop a moderate program of production and marketing of organic peanuts and peanut butter.

3. That RAF proceed with the purchase of an experimental farm and training center if a satisfactory purchase could be made.

4. That the Executive Director follow through on an attempt to get the cooperation of Frontlash and COPE in a voter registration program in South Florida. The Executive Committee approved the expenditure of $1,500 from NSF funds for this purpose.

In order to implement the instructions of the National Board and Executive Committee we have made the following structural and policy changes:

1. Upgraded Mr. Wilson by increasing his responsibilities in the field and giving him the additional title of Assistant to the Executive Director. In the field he will work on community organization, assistance to co-ops, and development of a constituency for the NSF legislative program.

2. Upgraded Mrs. Sablehaus to the position of Research Associate with full-time research responsibilities.

3. Hired Ms. Sheila Williams as Bookkeeper-Clerk in the Washington office and finalized plans to move the financial operation from New York to Washington. The actual move will be completed upon receipt of the 1971 CPA Audit and as soon as a new auditor can be hired in Washington. Bank resolutions, bonding procedures, and legal problems must also be solved prior to the move.

4. Expanded Mr. Blood's responsibilities to include marketing and technical assistance help to groups outside Burke County and changed his classification to that of Field Coordinator. His duties will include additional help to the Halifax County co-op and to other groups who may want it.

5. Hired a former VISTA in Burke County, Mr. Edward E. Frey, as a full-time field representative.

6. Negotiated a VISTA contract for Burke and surrounding counties, providing for 17 VISTA's. The cost to RAF is one-half of the VISTA Coordinator's salary plus some travel expenses. The VISTA Coordinator will be Mr. Bill Conner, who helped to develop the EGFC and Newburke Housing programs.

7. Authorized a bimonthly legislative report to be edited in the Washington office. It will be directed at the co-op members and a special "action" list. Special reports and calls for action will also be directed to our contributors.

8. Met with UFWOC, the Council for Community Action, National Coalition for Land Reform, and other groups for the purpose of developing a meaningful legislative coalition.

9. The $5,000 grant to SMHA made it possible for SMHA to continue regular operations into July, 1972, at which time negotiations with federal agencies for "administrative funds" should be favorably concluded.

10. A program for the production and marketing of organic peanuts and peanut butter was developed, and funding requests were forwarded to selected foundations. Unfortunately, because of delays in securing funds and identifying specific farmers and cooperatives to produce the peanuts, the actual implementation of this program will be delayed until the 1973 production period.

11. Negotiations for appropriate land for the experimental farm and training center were unsatisfactory owing to a shortage of funds and the withdrawal of a satisfactory site in Burke County, Ga., from the market. We will continue to seek appropriate land and funds for this essential project.

12. The voter registration program in South Florida is in progress with a $500.00 advance grant from NSF funds. National Board member Lipsig is negotiating with Frontlash and COPE for additional funds.

Financial Report

The Audit Report for 1971 is completed. Copies are available for inspection by members of the National Board. Attached to this report is a financial summary through April 30, 1972, including a report of funds on hand and earmarked funds not yet fully expended.

Fund Raising and Program Development

(Report to be presented by the Director of Development.)

Legislative Report

(Report to be presented by the Legislative Director.)

Other Activities

1. Eastern Georgia Farmers Cooperative (EGFC), Burke County, Ga.

Production and marketing plans are well under way in the EGFC. An organic program has been finalized and markets secured. As of May 20, 1972, 53 acres of land have been prepared and small acreages (1/2 to 5 acres) of approximately 20 different crops have been planted. Other crops will be planted later in the spring, and a fall planting is planned. Six local farmers, members of EGFC, are being trained in organic production methods and techniques. By the end of the year they will be prepared to produce organic crops on their own land or to assist other cooperatives who desire to enter the organic market.

The non-organic program instituted last year is continuing with more than 2,000 acres of beans, peas, cucumbers, squash, and other crops already planted. Participation in both programs will be expanded into four surrounding counties with the help of VISTA personnel.

2. Southern Agricultural Association of Virginia, Halifax County, Va.

In Halifax and Pittsylvania Counties, Va., RAF has set aside 100 acres for spring or fall crops of organic vegetables. Over 20 crops will be produced experimentally on this land. In addition, individual members of the cooperative are planting organic crops.

The cooperative has contracted to produce more than 100 acres of non-organic cucumbers for the pickle market.

3. Newburke Housing, Inc., Burke County, Ga.

With the assistance of the Housing Assistance Council, Newburke has extended its housing plans from 19 houses on 22 acres of land to 75 houses on 75 acres of land. A central water system is being developed under a HAC loan-grant program.

4. Southern Mutual Help Association, Abbeville, La.

With the $5,000 grant to SMHA from RAF approved by the last Executive Committee meeting, SMHA has been able to expand its efforts in support of its programs in lower Louisiana. While this will provide continuity for the next two to three months, additional funds are desperately needed. Fund raising for this project is one of our top priorities.

5. UFWOC

UFWOC made a dramatic and significant surge forward in the Southeast when it recently signed its first contract in Florida with Coca Cola. NSF resources and personnel are being made available to UFWOC upon request. To date UFWOC has needed little help from us.

6. Housing Assistance Council, Inc.

HAC is in full operation and has made a number of loans and grants for low-income rural housing. One of the first loans to be approved was to Newburke Housing. The $39,000 loan will provide a central water system for the 19 houses that are presently being built and water and planning studies for an additional 56 houses. HAC is also giving Newburke valuable technical assistance.

7. Foundation for Community Development, Durham, N.C.

The joint FCD-RAF program for the development of an agricultural community development corporation in Bertie County, N.C., is moving well. We are in the process of securing land at present. FCD is securing funding for the project, with RAF supplying technical assistance and planning and marketing information.

8. Southern Cooperative Development Fund

The SCDF has experienced some problems since the last meeting of the National Board but is apparently clearing them up and moving forward. Father McKnight, SCDF President, can give us additional information on the SCDF.

9. Sea Islands, S.C.

The Sea Islands projects are basically a joint church-federal-funded operation with technical assistance and advice provided by RAF. The programs are moving forward favorably.

On St. Helena Island we are assisting a farmers cooperative in the marketing of tomatoes.

On Johns Island a farmers cooperative is producing pickle cucumbers and moving into the fresh market with tomatoes, beans, and other vegetables.

On several islands HEW has funded health facilites and outreach clinics.

We are presently developing data for the organization of a seafood cooperative that will both harvest and process seafood for the commercial market.

Other programs (such as day care, tutorial) are being supported by other groups.

10. Other Areas

We are continuing our support of the South Carolina Council on Human Relations, the South Carolina Human Development Coordinating Council, and other groups as they request our assistance. The Gulf Coast Pulpwood Association in Mississippi, won its fight with Masonite and as a result is expanding rapidly in both membership and influence.

We are participating in an OEO effort to study rural development problems so that a more comprehensive program can be developed by OEO. I have been asked to chair the Task Force on Rural Economic Development. We also participated in a Field Foundation-sponsored conference at Epes,Alabama, on May 22-23 to discuss the problems of cooperatives. A full report on this conference is forthcoming.

We continue consultations with various groups interested in land reform under the auspices of the National Committee on Land Reform. We plan to develop a position paper on land reform for general distribution.

The months since our last National Board meeting have been full ones, active and rewarding in many respects, frustrating in others, but the staff feels we are moving forward at a satisfactory pace.

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE DIRECTOR
TO THE NSF NATIONAL BOARD
May 24, 1972

The legislative office of the National Sharecroppers Fund has been in operation for three years. The first year, we had only one individual in the office, John Wilson. We have since grown to three, including Antoinette Sabelhaus and Sheila Williams.

During the past year we have begun to gear our legislative efforts toward becoming a more effective advocate for our constituency. We are not at all pleased with our legislative record. However, I think we have done an extraordinary job with the limited resources and staff available.

We have worked on a variety of issues, with the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, Center for Community Change, Washington Research Project, and National Association for Community Development. In the last three years our tentacles have definitely expanded. The National Sharecroppers Fund is becoming an institution in Washington. It has become a guiding force in offering direction to interested parties who have some interest in the plight of farm workers and the rural poor. We have participated in press conferences concerning the United Farm Workers, the Agriculture Department's oppressive food stamp legislation, and nomination of Mr. Butz as Secretary of Agriculture.

I have also begun to assist the Executive Director in field programs, meeting with the Cooperative League of the U.S.A. for the purpose of expanding our field programs, with the Farmer Cooperative Service of the Department of Agriculture, and the State of Virginia Department of Agriculture for the purpose of developing regional marketing mechanisms.

I have participated in the Black Economic Development Conference, Sponsored by the Black Congressional Caucus, the National Association for Community Development convention, and the White House Conference on Aging. I have also met with the United Farm Workers Executive Director, Cesar Chavez.

When I came to Washington three years ago as Washington Representative for NSF, it was a learning experience for me, and I always will be grateful to NSF for the rare opportunity afforded so few Black people in this country. After the length of time I have spent as Legislative Director, I no longer feel that I am in a learning situation. I feel that my education has been complete and that I am much more competent and aware of the legislative procedure and the tools that are essential for a prosperous legislative program. We have implemented a Washington legislative newsletter and are beginning to compose an action list, now consisting of 2,200 names. The action list has to reach 50,000 before I would consider it an adequate list, and we are working toward that. My confidence in the program has increased.

While looking at our legislative record, we must take into consideration the Republican Administration and the conservative nature of the House of Representatives at present. Given the opportunity, the House has continuously taken a non-progressive position. The Senate has been bogged down with the War issue. The only piece of legislation we have been able to push through was the OEO bill, which was vetoed by the President in December, 1971.

We have also been in the process of establishing new coalitions. Development of new legislative coalitions is very difficult, basically because every legislative director has to make the same report that I am making today. An organization's funds and prestige are based upon its ability to produce. None of the organizations representing rural areas or farm workers has been productive legislation-wise in the last three years. Most of the organizations' legislative arms are bankrupt. The problem has been the wish to receive the credit without the obligation of helping to foot the bills. We are still working to bring about a powerful coalition around farm workers and the rural poor.

I hope to be able to report at our next Board meeting that we have a new Title VII in OEO, and that we have increased farm worker coverage under the minimum wage law. I also hope that we will have a child labor law and a more responsive Administration to work with.

The following outline of legislative goals was adopted by the NSF Executive Committee over a year ago. We are still working toward those goals. The summary which follows the outline capsulizes legislative developments which have occurred within that framework since the last NSF Board Meeting.

1. Hunger
   a. Removal of forced work requirement from Food Stamp Act.
   b. National eligibility standards for food stamps.
   c. Free food stamps for the needy.
   d. Food stamp programs (not commodity programs) in all counties.
   e. Continuation of Emergency Food and Medical Program (OEO).

2. Welfare
   a. Federalization of welfare at adequate levels.

3. Health
   a. Support for Senator Kennedy's approach to national health care.
   b. Close study of Nixon health plan as specifics are revealed.
   c. Adequate provision for rural people, especially the poor, in any health plan.

4. Farm Workers
   a. Urge Senator Stevenson to hold hearings of Subcommittee on Migratory Labor in rural areas and to introduce farm labor legislation.
   b. Urge Senator Humphrey to activate Agriculture Subcommittee on Rural Development on behalf of the rural poor.
   c. Support legislation to assure the right of farm workers to organize.
   d. Work for legislation for minimum wage, unemployment compensation, and safety standards for agricultural workers.
   e. Work with Senator Nelson's Subcommittee on Poverty.
   f. Work with Representative O'Hara and his Subcommittee on Farm Labor and Education in support of his "Farm Workers' Bill of Rights".

5. Housing
   a. Work for a comprehensive rural housing program, readily accessible to the poorest people. (NSF should cooperate with the Rural Housing Coalition in development of specific goals.)

6. Economis Development
   a. Support for rural economic development title in Economic Opportunity Act.

1. Hunger

There has been little improvement in the Food Stamp Act since November, 1971. A forced work requirement is still part of the Act, and only a family of four with an income of less than $30 per month can receive food stamps. Commodity Programs still exist in almost 1,000 counties, particularly in the South. Senator Percy has just introduced a bill (S. 3599) that would greatly improve the Commodities Programs.

A USDA Food and Nutrition service official recently testified before the Senate Subcommittee on Migratory Labor, stating that he could no longer work for FNS "in good conscience" because of its deliberate attempts to undermine the school lunch and breakfast programs.

2. Welfare

The welfare reform program is still pending in the Senate Finance Committee. Welfare reform is tied to a social security increase, and demands are now being made to drop welfare reform so that a bill can be passed to increase social security up to 20 percent. The total bill cannot be debated on the Senate floor until August, at the earliest.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Russell Long has been successful in pushing his "workfare" proposals through the Committee. It is his plan that welfare families with children ages 6-18 be disqualified from welfare but offered guaranteed federal jobs at $1.20 per hour. The Administration's $2,400 guaranteed annual income plan appears scrapped, along with Senator Ribicoff's more liberal proposals. Any improvements in Senator Long's "workfare" program will have to come on the Senate floor.

3. Health

Both the Kennedy and Nixon health plans are still under consideration. We still believe the Kennedy plan to be the more comprehensive and the one that would provide the best benefits to the rural poor. It is doubtful that either will be voted on this year.

4. Farm Workers

Minimum Wage -- A minimum wage bill will be reported out of committee soon in the Senate and has already been passed by the House. The House adopted the Administration bill over the more liberal committee bill by a close vote. Farm workers now covered by minimum wage would be increased from their present $1.30 per hour rate to $1.70 per hour by the end of 1973.

The Senate bill is much better in all respects and contains the following provisions for farm workers:

a) Increases farm worker minimum wage from present $1.30 rate to $1.70 60 days after passage to $2.00 one year later and $2.20 one year after that.

b) Extends coverage to as many as 150,000 additional farm workers including seasonal farm workers, by eliminating the loopholes in the present minimum wage law that now exclude many farm workers from being covered.

c) Bans any child under the age of 12 from performing farm labor unless the farm is owned by the child's parents. Children between the ages of 12 and 16 can work, but not during school hours.

NSF fully supports the Senate minimum wage bill and is lobbying members of the Senate Labor Committee to be certain that the farm worker provisions remain in the bill. The lobby effort will be stepped up when the bill comes to the House-Senate conference committee, where attempts will certainly be made by conservatives to strike the farm worker provisions.

Sugar Workers -- On March 27, NSF arranged for Sr. Anne Catherine, Fr. Vincent O'Connell, and sugar worker Gustav Rhodes to testify in Washington before Congressman O'Hara's Subcommittee on Agricultural Labor. The Subcommittee was looking into the fact that sugar workers did not receive their wage raise until January, 1972, rather than in September, 1971, the beginning of harvest and the usual time for an increase. In addition, they only received a 5 percent increase, which the Department of Agriculture said was caused by the wage-price freeze. However, growers received more than a 5 percent increase in prices. A lawsuit against USDA will be filed soon by an associate of Ralph Nader's.

Family Farm Act -- The Legislative Director testified on March 23 in support of this bill. A summary of that testimony was sent to all NSF Board members. There is no chance for passage this year.

Rural Development -- Senator Humphrey's Rural Development Act has been passed. It remains to be seen whether or not this bill, which opens up more credit sources to rural America, will actually benefit the rural poor, although the additional water and sewer funds will be very helpful.

Child Labor -- Although House hearings have been completed, this bill has yet to be reported out by the full House Labor Committee.

5. Housing

Senator McGovern's Emergency Rural Housing Administration bill, a program that would provide a comprehensive rural housing program for all, will probably not have hearings this year. It was felt that the bill, which has the full support of the National Rural Housing Coalition, would be subject to too many amendments in this election year.

The White House recently released $3 million in farm labor housing funds which it had frozen earlier. Release of the funds was accompanied by a statement praising the President for providing "additional" monies for farm labor housing.

6. Economic Development

The Community Economic Development Title, Title VII, of the OEO bill might be on its way to passage. The House passed the OEO bill in February without Title VII, but it is contained in the Senate version which is expected to pass with no trouble. The comprehensive child development program, once a part of the OEO bill, is now a separate piece of legislation. Thus, OEO stands a much better chance of passing and being signed by the President. The House should accept Title VII in the conference version of the bill, as it did the previous time, before the President vetoed the OEO bill. Title VII would provide a great deal of financial and technical assistance to co-ops.

However, OEO is threatened by a different piece of legislation, H.R. 6962, the Department of Community Development bill. This bill, part of the Administration's government reorganization plan, would transfer existing programs from HUD, Commerce, Transportation, and OEO into a new Department of Community Development. OEO would lose its Community Action Program and Special Impact Economic Development Program to this new Department. These two programs represent the bulk of OEO's constituency and funding; without them OEO would have even less strength than it now has.

NSF has written to all House members on this matter and is working to oppose it in conjuction with the Urban Coalition, NACD, and the leadership Conference on Civil Rights.

'Giantism on the Farm'

Three decades before Cesar Chavez began his uphill struggle to bring unionism to farm workers, the National Sharecroppers Fund launched a low-keyed but never-relaxed effort to alert the nation to the needs of this most exploited segment of America's labor force.

In its annual report, just released, the fund sums up the record for last year as "a harvest of hardship" aggravated by an intensified invasion of agriculture by giant business conglomerates. It estimates that more than 100,000 small farmers are forced off the land each year while business empires expand their farm holdings with the aid of tax advantages and Federal subsidies—a trend unchecked by Congressional passage in 1970 of easily evaded crop subsidy limitations.

By way of illustration, the report cites Tenneco, the country's 34th largest corporation, "which owns or leases more than a million acres in the West, plows its land with tractors manufactured by one of its subsidiaries, sprays its crops with pesticides from another and processes, packages and sells its produce through still other companies within the same corporate structure."

In a few instances the corporate intrusion has made a trifle easier the Chavez unionization drive, not necessarily out of humanitarianism but rather a desire to avoid the impact on over-all company profits of nationwide consumer boycotts backed by organized labor. However, the fund report makes plain how little real progress has yet been made in bringing farm workers anywhere close to a living wage. Two-thirds remain still outside the protection of the special Federal farm minimum wage of $1.30 an hour. The average annual wage for all the 1.4-million hired farm laborers who worked 25 days or more last year came to only $1,576. That doesn't put much food on their table, but then not too many have a table they can call their own.

JUL 10 1972

July 5, 1972

TO: All NSF/RAF National Board Members and all staff

FROM: James M. Pierce, Executive Director

RE: Experimental Farm and Training Center

At our May 24 National Board meeting you authorized the staff to secure funding and buy land to be used as an experimental organic farm and technical training center for low-income farmers and co-operative managers and staff.

One of our contributors has made funds available to us to purchase a 508-acre tract of land in Anson County, N.C. He is also going to provide funds for developmental purposes; that is, for primary facilities, land preparation, and initial equipment needs.

Anson County, N.C., is located in south central North Carolina on the South Carolina line. The largest town, Wadesboro, the county seat, has a population of 3,977 (1970 census figures). See Exhibit 1.

Other 1970 census figures are as follows:

Size	533 Square Miles
Population	23,488
Urban	3,977	(16.9%)
Rural	19,511	(83.1%)
White	12,853	(54.7%)
Non-white	10,635	(45.3%)

NOTE: Indian population (mostly Lumbee) may be listed as "white".

Male	11,267	(48%)
Female	12,221	(52%)

Other towns in the county: Ansonville (694), Lilesville (641), McFarland (140), Morven (562), Peachland (556), Polkton (845), and South Wadesboro (109).

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE RURAL ADVANCEMENT FUND ARE TAX-DEDUCTIBLE.

Other information:

Declining population. 27,000 plus in 1910, 24,962 in 1960.
High unemployment. Light, rural-oriented industry only.
A complete country profile has been requested from OEO.

ABOUT THE LAND:

The land is 8 miles south of Wadesboro on N.C. Hwy. 742, a paved, well-traveled state highway. It is 8 miles from U.S. 74 and equidistant from I-85 (67 miles) and I-95 (73 miles). It is approximately 200 miles from the Eastern Georgia Farmers Cooperative in Burke County, Ga., and approximately 175 miles from the Southern Agricultural Association of Virginia in Halifax County, Va. About 20 other low-income, mostly minority, agricultural cooperatives are located in North and South Carolina between the two listed above and at shorter distances from Wadesboro. More are being organized at the present time.

The farm is in two parts. The Edwards farm is divided by N.C. 742 and contains approximately 415 acres. The Hightower tract contains 92.7 acres. They are 3½ miles apart, thereby posing no staff or equipment problems. (See Exhibit II).

Each tract is unimproved, is ecologically clean and contains ideal water sources, both surface and underground. The ponds presently on the property are spring fed. Other pond sites are available. Jones Creek can be dammed at a number of locations if needed. Electric power lines and telephone lines cross the land on N.C. 742 right-of-way. Equipment repair services are available in Wadesboro, and labor is available in the immediate vicinity.

Soil samples indicate the land is ideal for our purposes and nearly identical to land available to low-income farmers, tenants, and sharecroppers in the states from Virginia through Georgia. Four distinct types of soil are found on the two pieces of property. In addition to vegetable production, it will support livestock, poultry, horticultural, fruit, berry, and nut production. Present wooded land can, in part, be converted into open land for increased vegetable production or for pasture, without adversely affecting the ecological balance.

National Board Member Arthur Raper has viewed the land and is satisfied we can reasonably expect a successful operation. It will, of course, take a lot of work and planning. Local agricultural personnel assure me it is ideally suited for our proposed operation.

North Carolina State University and North Carolina A&T specialists have offered their assistance, as has the local offices of U.S.D.A. Local residents are quite interested in the possibility of local participation in the project.

Facility construction, fencing, drilling, and land preparation can start immediately upon receipt of the developmental funds from our contributor and completion of the feasibility study recommended by the National Board. The farm should be ready for limited production in the spring of 1973 and has a reasonable chance of being self-sustaining within two years. No funds are required from the NSF/RAF operating budget except for staff so it should not interfere in any way with other programs of NSF/RAF.

If training grants can be arranged with foundations or government agencies within the next nine months, we will be able to start limited training operations at the same time we start production operations; that is, in early spring of 1973.

Aerial photographs, pictures, and feasibility reports will be forwarded to you as soon as they are available. Further reports will follow periodically.

Needless to say, I am excited, enthusiastic, and encouraged. We will have the only organic farm in America whose prime purpose is to restore rural America and assist low-income rural residents (and urban residents who want to return to the land) in organic methods. It will be a national showplace -- proof positive that we need not destroy our country in order to survive. I am sure the staff shares my feelings. We may well be on our way to helping farm cooperatives become the viable, successful alternative to rural migration and decay.

Thanks for your help and support in making this project possible.

MINUTES
Meeting of National Board
NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND, INC.
followed by Meeting of Members of
RURAL ADVANCEMENT FUND
November 20-21, 1972
Washington, D.C.

The meeting was called to order at 2:30 p.m. on November 20 by Chairman Mays, who presided until he had to leave, when the chairmanship was taken over by Vice Chairman Browne. Those present for some or all of the sessions were:

Board Members: Benjamin E. Mays, Robert S. Browne, George H. Esser, Jr., Shirley E. Greene, Lewis W. Jones, James Lipsig, Rev. A.J. McKnight, Robert J. Miles, Morris Milgram, Daniel H. Pollitt, Arthur F. Raper, Vera Rony, Rowland Watts, Raymond M. Wheeler.

Staff Members: James M. Pierce, Fay Bennett, Don Blood, Sister Anne Catherine, Charles W. Dixon, Nancy Firmin, Sheila V. Williams, John A. Wilson, Alice D. Wolfson.

MINUTES OF PREVIOUS MEETING

Action: It was voted to approve the minutes of the May 24 meeting of the National Board as mailed to Board members.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE REPORT

Executive Committee Chairman Greene summarized major actions taken at meetings held since the last Board meeting--one on September 18 (minutes of which were sent to all Board members) and one held just prior to today's Board meeting. The Board took action on certain of the Committee's recommendations, as indicated.

Halifax County, Va.: A committee (Greene, Johnson, McKnight) was appointed in September to visit the Southern Agricultural Association of Virginia for a full exploration of its future relationship with NSF. The committee was unable to visit SAAV but, with Mr. Browne replacing Mr. Johnson, has met and is to meet again today with three representatives of SAAV (Mr. Somerville, Mr. Farmer, and Mr. Wilkins) who have come here to present a new proposal. A report to the Board is scheduled for later on in the Board meeting.

Experimental Farm and Training Center: An estimated minimum budget for the center was approved, totaling $227,000 (itemized on page 4 of the September 18 minutes), of which $172,000 was already available in earmarked funds. It was proposed that the Executive Committee, at the time of its next meeting, hold a seminar for a thorough discussion of plans for the center, to which would be invited selected people with competence in various aspects, including co-op managers and members, field people, representatives of other organizations, and possibly some foundations.

Action: The Board voted to authorize the Executive Director to proceed with setting up a seminar on the experimental farm and training center, to be held on January 23 and 24 in Washington, D.C.

Stock from Carlson Bequest: In accordance with Executive Committee action, the 2,193 shares of Xerox stock were placed in the hands of a black broker, Mr. Bell of Daniels & Bell, Inc., with instructions to hold it for sale at 170 or over. The broker has advised selling at a lower figure and buying higher yield stocks. The Executive Committee now recommends selling the stock at about 150 and using up to $100,000 of the proceeds for operating expenses as needed through December 31 and/or for training center expenses, holding the balance in reserve in long-term high-yield investments pending further action by Executive Committee and Board.

Action: The Board voted to authorize the Executive Director, acting on behalf of RAF, in consultation with Daniels & Bell,Inc., to sell RAF's Xerox stock at about 150, with the following disposition of the proceeds: $100,000 to be applied to 1972 expenses and/or training center expenses, $200,000 to be put into long-term high-yield investments, and the remainder to be held in open account subject to further action by the Board.

Proposed Amendment to Bylaws: An amendment to increase the size of the Executive Committee has been drafted, in accordance with the Board's instruction, for submission to the annual (spring) meeting of the Board. But in order to broaden representation on the Executive Committee, as is the intent of the amendment, it is necessary first to modify the composition of the Board. The Committee therefore recommends that steps be taken to add representative Chicanos, Indians, and Appalachian whites to the Board, as well as some younger persons. It was agreed that minority members should be added to the Board with the understanding that, as yet, we have no programs in their areas but that they might help to develop some.

Action: Board members were urged to present suggestions for Board membership to the Executive Director as soon as possible, preferably before the January 23-24 meeting, to be turned over at the appropriate time to the Nominating Committee.

Requests for Funds: Grants approved by the Executive Committee on September 18 have been made to the Good Hope Farmers Cooperative Association ($850) and the Bluffton Oyster Cooperative ($1,600), both of South Carolina.

Proposed Study of Rural Development in China: Mr. Greene did not report on the Executive Committee's discussion of this proposal, since two of the proposal's originators would be present later on to discuss it with the Board.

Class-Action Lawsuits: NSF has twice recently been involved in class-action lawsuits. First, at the request of the Southern Mutual Help Association, we gave financial aid in a complaint of two individuals against the U.S. Department of Agriculture to force a reversal of the wage determination for sugarcane workers. The result was a Federal District Court injunction ordering USDA to reconsider sugarcane wages, make any wage increase retroactive to the beginning of the harvest season, and withhold subsidy payments pending the reconsideration. USDA's appeal was rejected.

In the second case, NSF has joined Migrant Legal Services as a plaintiff in a suit cosponsored by other organizations and individuals, also against USDA charging discrimination in employment and in committee assignments and non-conformity with Congressional mandates in policy and programs. The case has not yet been tried, but it has already resulted in a USDA request to NSF to submit minority and female nominees for 23 USDA advisory committees.

The Executive Director requested authorization to enter similar class-action lawsuits in the future. The Executive Committee recommended that a small committee be created, including one or more lawyers, to advise the Director when such cases arise, but to authorize the Director to use his own discretion if the committee is not available for consultation.

Action: The Board voted, after thorough discussion, to adopt the following guidelines for participation in class-action lawsuits:

The Board understands it to be within the legitimate and appropriate function of NSF on occasion to initiate or to participate with other organizations and/or individuals in class-action lawsuits over issues relevant to NSF's declared field of interest.

The responsibility for determining when such action shall be taken rests with the Executive Director. Among the criteria he shall use in deciding in a specific case whether or not to take such action shall be the following: Does the situation fall clearly within NSF's sphere of interest? Does the proposed action offer reasonable prospect of being successful or of achieving significant results? Is the anticipated cost involved fundable without undue strain on NSF's resources?

Normal procedure by the Executive Director in making these determinations shall include consultation with legal talent which is competent and knowledgeable on the issues at stake and consultation with the Executive Committee, or at least with the principal officers of NSF. In exceptional cases where immediate action is indicated, the Executive Director shall be free to make the necessary decisions.

In all cases of such action, the Executive Director shall promptly notify the Executive Committee of action taken and shall include a report of such action and of progress in the case at the next regular meeting of the National Board.

Action: It was voted to receive the Executive Committee report.

REPORT OF EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

Mr. Pierce presented a written report (copy attached) touching on legislation, field programs, fundraising, staff changes, support and advice given other organizations, and participation in our programs by business and labor groups. He added that the encouraging progress made in finding markets for co-op produce had necessitated considerably more staff travel than anticipated.

More funds and fund-raising are needed, especially for the political activity of NSF, contributions to which are not deductible, making them more difficult to obtain than RAF contributions.

Action: It was voted to accept the Executive Director's report.

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE DIRECTOR

Mr. Wilson presented a written report (copy attached) on NSF's major efforts in the legislative field, dealing especially with minimum wage legislation and extension and reorganization of OEO.

He called particular attention to the profiles of the new Senators and Representatives elected to the 93rd Congress (Appendix III of his report), as well as to the civil rights voting records of members of the 92nd Congress (Appendix I), a letter from Senator Nelson commending NSF for its efforts to preserve OEO (Appendix II), and a discussion of land reform legislation (Appendix IV).

Action: It was voted to receive the Legislative Director's report.

DISCUSSION OF LEGISLATIVE PROSPECTS

Five guests were introduced and gave their views on what we may expect from Congress and the Administration in the coming several years.

James N. Boylson, Executive Director, National Association for Community Development, discussed the future of the Office of Economic Opportunity. Even though OEO has been extended for another two years, he stated, there will be serious cutbacks, especially at the local level, where whole new relationships will have to be developed. Our organizations will have to watch out for local interests, since no one at the federal level will be doing so.

The President will use his executive prerogative in government reorganization and will probably create a new Department of Community Development, into which a part of the present OEO will be placed. The Administration apparently will seek to eliminate programs with the stamp of the "Great Society" on them, and other key programs will be transplanted, one by one, to areas where they will be less effective. Our organizations and others must band together to keep poverty issues before Congress and the public.

Jon W. Linfield, Executive Secretary, National Rural Housing Coalition, deplored the almost total lack of rural housing programs. Rural housing bills in the last session died in committee. Public housing in rural areas exists in theory but not in practice. The Farmers Home Administration has virtually the only program for rural housing. But subsidies alone are not enough, and even they are insufficient.

We must get rural housing higher on the list of Congressional priorities. We should press for a series of hearings on rural housing, possibly based around a bill similar to last session's McGovern-Abourezk bill to provide housing for all rural people, starting with the poorest.

The proposed Department of Community Development he felt would be a disaster, since a super-department would undoubtedly provide less service than smaller departments.

Boren Chertkov, Counsel, Senate Subcommittee on Migratory Labor, stated that NSF deserves credit for doing a good job in an uphill battle.

He then outlined some accomplishments of the past year. The Senate passed a fairly good minimum wage bill. The Department of Labor completed a good study of unemployment compensation which will be made public soon. Coverage of farm workers by workmen's compensation has been recommended, and social security coverage for farm workers was introduced as an amendment, though White House opposition caused its defeat. Foreign labor importation and the entire farm subsidy program have been under attack.

On the negative side are the expiration of the Migrant Health Act, scheduled for next June, the serious threat to education programs (Title I of the Health and Education Act), lack of progress in abolition of child labor, and the promise of no jobs for rural America in public service employment. With Senator Mondale, he deplores the "powerlessness of rural America."

At present, the Senate Subcommittee is working on viable alternatives for rural America (Can the small farmer survive?) and on determining what kind of legislation might be developed.

Jim Harrison, Staff Director, House Subcommittee on Farm Labor, expressed satisfaction at the defeat of Proposition 22 in California, which would have been a serious setback to agricultural workers, but he indicated that the Farm Bureau may now intensify its effort to gain passage of repressive legislation on the federal level.

A major goal next year will be labor-management relations legislation. A minimum wage bill, including a farm worker provision, will be passed, he stated, as will tough child labor legislation. Congress will have to keep a watchful eye on the Administration during the coming four years. The House Subcommittee will continue to prepare legislation and will also engage in "oversight" activities, to make sure that the USDA, for instance, does not overlook its legal duties.

Stephen E. Bossi, Washington Director, Rural Life Division of the U.S. Catholic Conference, stated that Congress is not where the action is--it's out in the field. New loan and grant money is available that wasn't there before. All of us will have to work together, in coalition, watching developments in the Rural Development Act. He stressed the need for a more outspoken rural constituency and more advocacy for the grassroots level.

In the discussion following these presentations, it was emphasized that we must act as watchdog and monitor, especially on the local level, and must participate in Congressional hearings, bringing information back to local communities. While the make-up of Congress is about the same as before, the Administration now thinks it has a mandate, and we have got to be on the alert to prevent a take-over by the Executive Branch, fighting a defensive battle if necessary. We face a tough four years.

DISCUSSION OF RURAL DEVELOPMENT ACT

Raymond Williams, of Cooperative Extension Service, USDA, currently on special assignment to the Secretary of Agriculture for implementation of the Rural Development Act, was present to explain provision of the Act, particularly those portions of special concern to NSF.

Title I deals with overall planning and development, especially through grants and loans. Grant funds will be available for developing projects in such areas as water pollution, sewers, and industries. Loans will be made to co-ops, corporations, and other groups, even public bodies, involving the total community and the total range of community needs. These include loans for essential services, such as health and education, and a guaranteed loan program for housing.

Title V is also very important. It deals with research and extension programs, involving land grant colleges and also private colleges. But there is little financial authorization for this Title. Title VI deals with coordination of development in rural areas. An Assistant Secretary for Rural Development is to be appointed.

Mr. Williams termed this the most significant legislation on rural matters in 25 years and stated that probably several billion dollars a year would be involved as the program unrolled.

In order to obtain a loan or grant, a project must demonstrate that it is sound and has already performed useful service. It must also prove that it has feasibility, accountability, and adequate personnel. The area to be served must be a rural area as defined in the law. Loans are to be made through a variety of loan-making agencies.

FINANCIAL REPORT

Mr. Pierce presented a statement of expenditures and income for the first ten months of 1972 (copy attached) which showed that we had operated within the budget, having spent $293,013 out of the budget of $302,516 for that period. Certain items, such as total salaries, were less than budgeted, but payroll taxes, printing, postage, and mailing costs were considerably more. However, income through October 31 totaled only $219,770.

Funds contributed for special projects not included in the operating budget are listed separately and so far this year total $311,267. Such earmarked funds not yet spent now total $206,489. Cash on hand on October 31 was $138,919. There is thus a deficit of approximately $67,000, though this amount may be reduced by the end of 1972 as a result of new contributions coming in.

Action: It was voted to accept the financial report.

REPORT ON RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT

Miss Bennett presented a written report (copy attached) on her work in fundraising and development of other resources, including the film on Halifax County being produced by Morten Parker. She stated that a total of $162,932 had been raised thus far in 1972 through direct-mail appeals ($77,375 from mailings to outside lists and $85,557 from our house list).

Bequests of $52,672 (not including the Xerox stock) have been received. Income from other sources has totaled $4,166, bringing total receipts for the ten months to $219,770. She estimated that total income for the full year would come to approximately $280,000. (These figures do not include gifts from foundations or other sources earmarked for special projects.)

There was brief discussion of the value of outside appeals. Miss Bennett pointed out that these appeals are educational tools as well as a means of gaining new contributors to add to our house list. House mailings produce a much higher percentage response and larger average gifts.

Action: It was voted to accept the report on resouces development.

PROPOSED BUDGET FOR 1973

Mr. Pierce presented a proposed preliminary budget for 1973. The total comes to $398,580, which is $35,560 more than the 1972 budget. The increase is largely attributable to more realistic figures for printing, postage, and mailing costs, based on the assumption that outside appeals will be continued at the present rate. Payroll taxes will be going up again, and the item for staff travel is larger. The item for salaries is subject to increase following negotiations with the union.

The question was raised of where the income will come from to meet a larger budget, when we can't even raise enough for this year's budget. In reply, it was pointed out that there is a job that needs to be done, and we must do it somehow. The Executive Director and other staff members watch expenditures very carefully and cut down wherever necessary or feasible. In the new budget, there are four staff positions that are not filled; the horticulturist job should be filled, but the rest will have to wait if funds are not available. Further possible economies were discussed.

Action: It was voted to approve the proposed budget subject to the considerations discussed.

PROPOSED STUDY OF RURAL DEVELOPMENTS IN CHINA

Two guests presented a proposal, drawn up by a group of concerned individuals, for a study of developments in Chinese agriculture.

Benton Rhoades, of Agricultural Missions, Inc./National Council of Churches, stated the objectives of the proposal: (1) To learn relevant lessons from the Chinese experience in rural development. (2) To develop friendly liaison between rural people's movements in China and North America. (3) To open new understanding by Americans of the Chinese people today, especially the 80 percent who live in rural areas.

He commented that a program that had broken the grip of rural poverty on people deserved a thorough investigation from which we might learn much of value.

Donald MacInnis, of the China Program, National Council of Churches, outlined the three stages of the proposed study: (1) A consultation in the U.S. or Canada, with about 30 participants from rural people's movements, to examine China's rural development experience for points of relevance to the American rural sector. (2) A dialogue on issues of mutual concern at the Chinese Embassy in Ottawa. (3) A visit to China's rural sector by an observation/study group of 10-12 American rural leaders.

Speakers at the consultation would include agricultural specialists who had been in China recently and Chinese and academic specialists. It is hoped that the consultation might be held in February, the visit to the Embassy at about the same time, and the trip to China in May, though there is no assurance of getting visas by then.

Mr. MacInnis urged that NSF agree to be principal sponsor of the study. Both Agricultural Missions and the China Program of NCC have endorsed the program and offered some financial support but would not qualify as principal sponsor since church organizations are suspect in China.

Mr. Greene said he thought NSF was well qualified to be principal sponsor because of its broad representation, broad concern, and long history. Cosponsors should include Chicano, Indian, and Appalachian white organizations since NSF lacks adequate representation of these communities.

There was extensive discussion, and additional discussion by the Executive Committee was reported, concerning whether or not NSF should sponsor the plan, what individuals should participate, and who should speak at the consultation.

It was agreed that any delegation to China should include people with enough maturity politically to keep them from being brainwashed, and that they should have sophistication in answering questions. Care should be exercised in the selection of speakers for the consultation, avoiding persons who are too narrowly partisan or counterbalancing them with objective scholars and including persons who would give critical support.

In general, there was agreement that the consultation alone would be well worth while and helpful as related to rural development in the South. The trip to China is not essential to the validity of the project.

Dr. Jones, however, questioned whether the project would be of core value to NSF or a luxury that could not be afforded in terms of personnel time, funds, or whatever else might be involved.

Mr. Lipsig favored taking part in the consultation but opposed NSF's serving as sponsor because of possible adverse publicity. He also questioned the value of the China trip, fearing that we would come back with a need to advocate political decisions that we would not be able to advocate. He felt that, to be really fruitful, the project should include study of and trips to Russia and Yugoslavia, for instance.

Miss Bennett urged that a visit to Japan be included as part of a China trip, since Japan has programs for small farmers, co-ops, and land reform that would be well worth our attention. Others agreed that investigation of relevant programs in countries other than China would be appropriate.

> Action: It was voted, with negative votes by Dr. Jones and Mr. Lipsig, to endorse the proposed study of rural developments in China as one of a series of studies of experiences in other countries, to accept the principal sponsorship, and to authorize the Executive Director to work closely with the consultation and whatever might develop from it.

Further discussion centered on details concerning our role in the project. It was agreed there should be a steering committee including representation from each of the cosponsors.

Action: It was voted to name Mr. Greene, Mr. Pierce, Miss Rony, Mr. Browne, LaDonna Harris, and Lamond Godwin to serve on the steering committee for the China project.

Mr. Greene reported that some foundation funds might be available, and that many church organizations have frozen Chinese mission funds that could be used if the trip to China materialized. A small amount of money is needed immediately as seed money to attract additional funds.

Action: It was voted to appropriate $1,000 to the project, in the hope that special contributions can be raised to cover this amount.

On the matter of selection of persons to attend the consultation, the suggestion was made that each Board member submit names of up to 30 people for consideration. It was agreed that the participants should be people with leadership roles among their constituencies, with grassroots contacts, and with communicative skills. Mr. Pierce asked that suggestions be sent to him and stated he would ask others for suggestions also.

DISCUSSION OF FIELD PROGRAMS

Coastal Plains, South Carolina: John W. Gadson, Sr., Executive Director of Penn Community Services, Frogmore, S.C., was present to show some slides, and he and Mr. Pierce discussed programs in that area.

The Coastal Plains area, comprising 20 counties, is the poorest and most rural, has the largest percentage of blacks, receives the smallest amount of federal aid, and has the most outmigration of any area in the state. It also has a growing number of self-help organizations, including child development centers, oyster and shrimp co-ops, an upholstery co-op, comprehensive health centers, farm co-ops, and a co-op grocery store, all of which manage to get by on extremely limited funds.

Recently, 22 of these groups formed the Coastal Plains Human Development Coordinating Council, for the purpose of improving communication between them, bringing all in touch with existing resources, and developing new resources. The staff, kept to a bare minimum to encourage people to continue to do things for themselves, consists in a coordinator, Brad Fowler, hired with help of an NSF grant.

NSF has been actively concerned with this area, as have several church groups. Now, Governor West of South Carolina has become interested and is to meet with Mr. Pierce, Mr. Greene, and others to discuss possible ways in which state agencies may help. Mr. Gadson's slides were taken in preparation for that meeting.

Halifax County, Virginia: Father McKnight reported for the committee appointed by the Executive Committee to meet with the representatives of the Southern Agricultural Association of Virginia to discuss SAAV's relationship with NSF.

The group had met and had also considered SAAV's request, submitted by the three representatives, for a loan of $40,000. Of this, $20,000 was to purchase fetilizer at a discount and $20,000 to develop a self-service gasoline operation. SAAV also requested grants for organic farming, a cold storage unit, and several other projects. The representatives reported that SAAV had received no OEO funds since August, so that money that would have been used for fetilizer had had to go for administrative costs.

Father McKnight stated that the principal problem appeared to be lack of communication between NSF and SAAV and a confusion of roles, which had resulted in almost dual management. As a result of today's meeting, the lines of communcation are now open. The co-op wishes to continue its working relationship with NSF.

The committee recommended that NSF make a grant of $12,000, if SAAV were not refunded by OEO, to help subsidize SAAV's manager and expenses, and that an additional $8,000 be made available if SAAV would be willing to plant at least 20 acres in organic crops. NSF would provide technical assistance and SAAV would furnish complete financial accounting.

The committee also recommended that NSF make an interim loan of $20,000 for fertilizer, pending the processing of a loan through the Southern Cooperative Development Fund; the loan would be repaid to NSF by SCDF. Mr. Pierce would draw up a detailed presentation, setting forth what was expected of each party to these transactions, which would be discussed, voted on, and signed by SAAV.

Action: It was voted, in accordance with the committee's recommendations as presented by Father McKnight, to authorize a grant of $20,000 to SAAV and a loan of $20,000 pending the processing of a loan from SCDF.

Burke County, Georgia: A report of expenses and income for 1972 revealed that NSF had contributed $32,908 toward expenses of the Eastern Georgia Farmers Cooperative; this amount to be reduced somewhat upon sale of fall crops.

Mr. Pierce read a letter from EGFC requesting funds for a co-op manager and for final payment due on the pea-picker. He recommended a grant similar to that given SAAV, that is $12,000 towards the co-op manager and expenses and $8,000 for organic crop development.

Action: It was voted to authorize a grant of $20,000 to EGFC.

In response to a question, Mr. Pierce stated that the money could come from the uncommitted balance from sale of the Xerox stock.

Southern Louisiana: Sister Anne Catherine reported on the precarious financial situation in which the Southern Mutual Help Association finds itself. It has been supporting itself on a percentage basis through its government-funded programs. Certain of these programs did not receive final approval till a month ago; they were to have been funded retroactively through 1971. But SMHA had received funds for only as far back as March, 1972, and therefore finds itself short more than $6,000. Sister Anne Catherine expressed hope that a loan could be repaid.

Action: It was voted to make a loan of $6,000 to SMHA, to be repaid if and when anticipated government funds are forthcoming.

Anson County, North Carolina: Mr. Pierce reported briefly on the Experimental Farm and Training Center, which is located on the border between the rich-soiled piedmont and the sandy-soiled coastal plain. It has the type of marginal farm land that the average small farmer has.

Maps have been prepared by Georgia Tech. experts showing soil composition, a land use plan, and architectural plans for buildings and sheds, including plans for expansion. We are also getting a lot of help from the Soil Conservation Service and some contributions of equipment.

We are proceeding slowly and carefully. It is hoped that at least 100 acres will be planted in vegetables this spring and that a cattle operation will be started. The emphasis will be 10 percent on the experimental farm and 90 percent on training. Training funds from the Department of Labor are anticipated.

Miscellaneous Programs: Mr. Pierce reported a grant of $75,000 to RAF from the Rockefeller Brothers Fund. He recommended that $30,000 be allocated to general RAF operating expenses, and that the remainder be allocated as follows: South Carolina Council on Human Relations, $7,500 for program with RAF; Penn Community Center, $10,000; Gulf Coast Pulpwood Association, $9,500 pending further investigation; Deep South Educational & Research Association, $6,500; Arkansas Council on Social Justice, $5,000; Clay County (Mississippi)Community Development Corp., $6,500.

Action: It was voted to approve the recommendations of the Executive Director regarding allocation of funds received from the Rockefeller Brothers Fund, subject to their being used to further the objectives of the Rural Advancement Fund.

NEXT BOARD MEETING

Mr. Pierce suggested that the next meeting of the National Board be held in the South, possibly at the NSF training center, if far enough along, or at Penn Center with a side trip to Burke County. It was agreed that the Executive Committee should make the final determination. It was also agreed that the meeting should be held as late in the spring as possible, preferably in June, and an informal vote favored Friday and Saturday, June 15 and 16.

The meeting adjourned at 2:45 p.m. on November 21.

MEETING OF MEMBERS OF RURAL ADVANCEMENT FUND

A meeting of Members of the Rural Advancement Fund of the National Sharecroppers Fund, Inc., was convened at 2:45 p.m. on November 21, 1972, with the following present:

Shirley E. Greene, Lewis W. Jones, A.J. McKnight, Robert J. Miles, Rowland Watts.

Action: It was voted to accept all reports presented to the NSF National Board at its meeting just concluded and to concur in all National Board actions relevant to RAF's purposes and program.

The meeting adjourned at 2:55 p.m.

REPORT OF EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR
to the NSF National Board
by James M. Pierce
November 20, 1972

If nothing else happens in 1972, it will be a year long remembered by the NSF staff. On the political and legislative field we experienced both success and failure--sometimes simultaneously. Nixon was reelected, but Congress did not change hands. The OEO Bill was passed, including Title VII, but without appropriations. The Rural Development Act was passed, but we don't know what the value will be to the rural poor until the guidelines are drawn up. More of our priority legislation got through Committee than ever before, but most of it died at adjournment of Congress.

In the field, we watched SMHA's health program grow, with doctors, dentists, and nurses achieving remarkable outreach to previously ignored poor people. We also felt the frustrations as professional staff discovered health conditions that, in many cases, were past the point they could be corrected. We saw a beautiful organic crop of sweet potatoes and other vegetables in Virginia, but we also lost 10 acres of crops during the flood. In Georgia, the co-op is moving forward very well despite a serious midsummer drought that destroyed most of the pea crop. We helped the co-op obtain a VISTA contract to expand the membership into additional counties, only to find that the VISTA's were not willing, or able, to adjust to local conditions and work with the co-op members properly. The co-op finally had to cancel the VISTA contract.

In South Carolina, we saw the Coastal Plains Human Development Coordinating Council draw more than 20 self-help groups together into a working, cooperative organization that was able to attract additional funding and interest the Governor in its problems. The Council has been invited to meet with Governor West and selected foundation people on December 4, to discuss joint efforts to reduce poverty in South Carolina.

Our fundraising efforts have been both good and bad. Results of mail appeals were below normal in the spring and summer as people responded to the grass-roots fund appeals from McGovern, but they were more than compensated for by a final settlement of the Carlson bequest that netted us $47,500 in cash and 2,193 shares of Xerox stock, valued at about $330,000 on today's market. In addition we received $200,000 more toward the acquisition and development of our experimental farm and training center, bringing the total contributed for that project to $280,000. We expect an improvement in receipts as a result of our year-end appeals, which usually produce rather well.

We have made a few staff changes. Ms.Hammond resigned in New York and was not replaced. We terminated Mr. Frey in Georgia, effective December 8, at the end of this year's crop season. Ms.Sabelhaus resigned in Washington and was replaced by Ms.Firmin. Mr. Weil was hired to live on and do preliminary work on the training center. Our staff presently consists of three people in New York, three in Washington, four in the field, plus Fay Bennett and me, for a total of twelve. We are still understaffed and hope to increase our staff as finances permit.

We have made some very meaningful contacts in marketing. This year we sold organic foods to Village Markets in Pennsylvania, through the Poor People's Development Foundation in New York City, to Consumers and Mid-East Cooperative stores in Washington and New York City, and to others. We had many requests we could not fill. We sold non-organic foods to a number of processors and in the fresh market. We gave marketing assistance to other cooperatives and to New Communities. Dr. Allie Felder of the Cooperative League has been most helpful in arranging meetings with markets and, in some cases, serving as the marketing link between low-income cooperatives and consumer cooperatives. We expect to do much more in the marketing field next year.

We have continued to give support and advice to the United Farm Workers, the Gulfcoast Pulpwood Association, the Florida Farm Workers Organization, the National Coalition for Land Reform, the Southern Cooperative Development Fund, and others.

We continued our support to the Southern Agricultural Association of Virginia and the Eastern Georgia Farmers Cooperative. We made a small grant to the Bluffton Oyster Cooperative to buy an ice-crusher, another to the Good Hope Farmers Cooperative to buy a sweet popato picker, and a grant to the Coastal Plains Human Development Coordinating Council to hire a coordinator for a three-month period. Special project funds contributed to RAF were turned over to New Communities and the Poor People's Development Foundation for their marketing program. We put one of our contributors, Mr. Prentice Ford, in touch with low-income farmers in Florida through Bill Johnson; he is helping them to start their own cooperative.

We shared our experiences and dreams with the National Institute for Community and Economic Development in California and with organic farmers and marketing people brought together by Rodale. We are working with the Foundation for Community Development in North Carolina as they prepare a land utilization program for Soul City.

Our appeals to business and labor for active participation in our programs are beginning to produce results. Fruehauf Trailer Company gave us two 40-foot refrigerated trailers to be used as temporary cold storage units, and Garden Way Manufacturing Company gave us a new Troy-Bilt Rototiller for use at the training center. The Rodale people are asking their advertisers to consider making contributions to our effort. The Cement Workers local union in Charlotte has offered to do all the cement work free at the training center and is helping us secure free labor from other craft unions in the area.

Several other activities are scheduled for in-depth discussion at this meeting. They include our legislative and political program, two public-interest court actions, fundraising, the experimental farm and training center, the Coastal Plains Human Development Coordinating Council in South Carolina, and a proposal concerning a study of people's movements and rural development in China.

On balance, 1972 should be considered a successful year, but we must consider and attempt to correct some of our deficiencies. We are clearly understaffed and will continue to be until we can increase our income. Understaffing has created a lack of communication, internally between our staff and externally with the groups with whom we are working. Many calls for help must be refused. Research and legislative action programs need additional input of both money and manpower.

In closing, I would like to express my feelings about our staff. They are working extremely hard, often without sufficient tools. They are building a good NSF. I am extremely proud of them. If you have any questions about any of our programs, we will be happy to answer them. More important to us, if you have suggestions that will make it possible for us to do a better job, we will be most grateful.

REPORT ON RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT

by Fay Bennett

November 20, 1972

A great deal of my time continues to be spent in organizing and developing our mail appeals, to our own house list and to outside lists. I have also continued to spend some time developing resources for our local programs. These efforts have resulted in a $20,000 gift from the Readers Digest Foundation and another special gift of $5,000 for the Halifax County health group and a full-time volunteer nutritionist to work with the Louisiana program.

Educational Film

The film is at last in the final stages, and we hope it will be completed within the next few weeks. Special background music has been written by Charlie Byrd. The last thing to be done is to include the narration, and we hope that Melvyn Douglas will be the narrator. Helen Gahagan Douglas will help us to reach some of the large donors to the McGovern campaign, and we have other ideas for using the film to attract large gifts. We hope it will also be used on a national television network, and of course it will be available to local groups as an educational tool. (P.S. Because of the illness of Melvyn Douglas, the narration is being done by Dustin Hoffman.)

Mail Appeals to Outside Lists

Approximately 487,000 letters were mailed during the first half of 1972 to outside lists. These have brought in a total of 4,612 responses through October 31. Of these, 2,215 were new contributors and 2,397 were our own contributors. Income from this mailing totaled $61,377.50. Of this amount, $28,224.50 came from new contributors and $33,153.00 from our own people.

Our outside mailings were suspended at midyear because of heavy competition from the McGovern campaign (which was financed in large part through mail appeals). We had noted also that our appeal based on the SMHA brochure was not doing as well as expected. We have now prepared a new brochure, based on the Burke County program, and outside mailings will be resumed next week.

In addition to receipts from appeals mailed this year, we continue to receive gifts resulting from mailings to outside lists sent out last year and the year before. These have totaled 1,111 gifts this year, of which 735 were from new donors and 376 from our own people. From the new donors we received $8,618.83, and our people gave $7,378.47, making a total of $16.097.30. Thus we have a grand total received during the first ten months of 1972 from our outside mailings of $77,374.80, from a total of 5,723 gifts.

Mail Appeals to House List

Two house mailings were sent out during the first ten months of 1972. The first, with the annual report, brought a total of $26,661.67 from 1,961 donors. The second, with "The Condition of Farm Workers and Small Farmers in 1971", produced $14,318.03 from 1,109 donors. The house list now includes more than 26,000 names.

A special personalized mailing over my signature was sent on October 12 to 272 top contributors who had not yet given in 1972. By October 31, this had brought in 21 gifts, totaling $1,871.00. Returns are still coming in.

Other contributions from persons on our house list include 22 gifts from special contributors totaling $20,998.88 and an additional 1,010 gifts totaling $21,697.83 from various sources. Some of these came in response to house mailings sent out last year, a few resulted from the Washington newsletter, and some were from unidentifiable sources.

Another mailing, sent on October 20 to donors who have not contributed in the past five years, is not included in this report, since it was a third-class mailing and returns did not begin to come in until November.

A third house appeal, consisting in a 3-page letter-report by Jim Pierce, was mailed October 30. Returns are now coming in very well. In early December, a brief year-end appeal will go to the house list.

Other Income

Earmarked funds received in 1972 totaled $311,268.52. Bequests totaled $52,672.66, not including the Xerox stock, valued at approximately $330,000.

Projected Income for Year

Based on income received during the first half of November and anticipated income through December 31, we expect our total income from contributions for 1972 to be in the neighborhood of $280,000. This does not include earmarked funds nor possible foundation gifts.

SUBJECT: U.S.-China Rural Study Program

The actions of the NSF National Board at the November 20-21 meeting will be reflected in the minutes of the meeting that will be mailed to you within a few days. Briefly, they included instructions to the staff to continue support for the Burke and Halifax cooperatives, to proceed with the construction of facilities at the new training center and to consider the possibility of filing additional legal actions against governmental agencies that fail to perform for poor people in accordance with their mandates.

An important decision was to act as a principal sponsor for a U.S.-China Rural Study Program. The enclosed document explains the rationale and objectives of the Study Program.

It is extremely important that the people who participate in the consultation and those who make up the possible visitation group be representatives of the rural poor or able to address themselves to the needs and desires of the rural poor.

We need nominations of people you think could best serve in such a capacity. The sponsoring committee will select from your nominations approximately 30 people to participate in the consultation. Feel free to nominate any number of people up to 30 giving a brief description of them and their qualifications.

It is important that your nominations be in the hands of the sponsoring committee prior to December 12. Please send them to me at the New York office and I will forward them to the sponsoring committee for final selection.

We sincerely appreciate your assistance in this matter.

Thanks for your support & advice

U.S.-CHINA RURAL STUDY PROJECT

PROPOSAL

A three-stage program is proposed, with the purpose of improving people-to-people understanding between the rural people of China and North America:

1. A consultation in the U.S. or Canada, with participants drawn from rural people's movements, will examine China's rural development experience for points of relevance in the American rural sector today. Speakers would include agricultural specialists who have lived in or visited China recently, Chinese specialists from the China mission, and academic specialists.

2. A visit to the Chinese Embassy in Ottawa for direct dialogue on issues of mutual concern in rural development.

3. A visitation group of American rural leaders for an observation/study group in China's rural sector.

OBJECTIVES:

1. To learn from the Chinese experience in analysis of their rural development problems, their experiments and successes.

2. To develop friendly liaison between rural people's movement leaders in China and North America, hoping for two-way reciprocal visits and ongoing communication.

3. To open new understanding, by Americans, of the Chinese People today, especially the 80% who live in rural areas.

RATIONALE:

The most far-reaching rural revolution in man's history has transformed China's rural sector since 1949. While the social, political and economic context in China and North America are quite different, Americans, facing rural problems of their own, might well learn from China's analysis of her rural problems, and the wide range of experiments in rural reforms that are in progress.

- mutual aid and collective action (farm communes)
- priority of man over technology and profits
- concern for social justice, liberation of minorities and women
- group participation in decision-making (revolutionary committees)
- the problem of urban-rural differences
- new forms of education merging theory and practice, classroom and labor
- equalized delivery of public health services
- resistance to waste and consumerism; recycling of wastes
- involvement of youth and women

It can be expected that a reciprocal visit of rural leaders from China might follow a successful consultation, visits to the Embassy in Ottawa, and a visitation group to China. Such visits have taken place in Japan.

IMPLEMENTATION:

1. The consultation can be set up independent of cooperation from the Chinese, either in Ottawa or the Chinese Mission to the U.N. However, we have hopes of cooperation.

2. Visits by a small group to the Chinese Embassy in Ottawa are quite feasible. There are numerous precedents for this.

3. The proposal for a visitation group to China is dependent on the issuing of visas by the PRC government. We can expect that they would look favorably on such a proposal, especially if the consultation and the visit to Ottawa were successful.

In two of America's poorest areas, men and women who had forgotten how to hope are beginning to remember again.

They are the impoverished rural people, most of them black, of Burke County, Georgia, and Halifax County, Virginia. For generations, they watched their babies die at twice the white rate. They saw their cotton and tobacco farms shrink under the pressure of racism and discriminatory national agricultural policies. Shacks sagged, debts took food from the table, and flight from the land they loved seemed to many the only solution. So they fled by the thousands to the dubious sanctuaries of city ghettos. Those who determined to remain on the land found themselves being picked off, one by one, by the forces of poverty.

Today, in Burke and Halifax, the people have come together in cooperatives that are transforming the land—and the spirit—of their counties. They are farming together, planning together, and hoping together. And, with significant new assistance from the National Sharecroppers Fund and its Rural Advancement Fund, they are producing a rural Renaissance that cynics said was not possible.

Signs of the times tell the story. In Burke, a sign in the office of the Eastern Georgia Farmers Cooperative says:

"If you do something for your co-op, your co-op will do something for you."

Outside the new marketing shed of the Southern Agricultural Association of Virginia (SAAV), in Halifax, the proud slogan reads:

"We Ain't No Big Thing But We're Growing."

Growing healthful, profitable organic crops on land written off as useless. Reaping fine vegetable harvests with modern machinery on irrigated land once parched and fallow. Producing a new way of life than can reverse the old pattern of tragic migrations.

Woodrow Harvey is chairman of the Burke co-op. He says:

"For the first time, I can see the way clear for a lot of folks who left to come back and farm. And for a lot who might leave to stay on. One man saw our new co-op harvester taking up more peas in a day than his family could handpick in a week. Next year you can be sure he'll really be into that pea production. Word has gotten around and I've heard from friends in New York and Chicago who say they're ready to return now. We're not out of the woods. Folks who've been blindfolded a hundred years can't all open their eyes overnight. But with the support from the Rural Advancement Fund of NSF, more eyes are opening every day."

A TRUE COMMUNITY

Four hundred miles away in Halifax, SAAV farmer Robert Wilkins was tired of farming tobacco, a crop that went up in smoke along with most of the profits. Now he watches his fields of plump cucumbers and squash being harvested by co-op workers while irrigation pipes spray another patch threatened by drought.

"This is the first time in my life I had irrigation," says Wilkins. "Always wanted it but couldn't afford it. You watched the white man irrigate while your fields dried up. They laughed when the co-op said we'd get it. But we got it. Got something else too that you can't count by the bushel. We have people helping each other to get out of the hole we been in. We have a true community."

ASPIRATIONS INTO PROGRAMS

The co-ops of Burke and Halifax are only three years old. But they represent the logical result of three decades of service to the rural poor by the National Sharecroppers Fund. The aim has always been: Help the poor to help themselves. Their problems often went unnoticed, particularly by urban Americans quick to condemn rural migrants on welfare but slow to comprehend that people in cities ate well while many families producing the food went hungry.

NSF fought for humane farm legislation and against Agriculture Department programs that kept poor farmers in general and black ones in particular ignorant of technological advances. It campaigned against racism that denied black farmers the loans that made white farmers solvent. At the same time, NSF workers went into the fields, listening to farm families, translating their aspirations into programs of change.

CO-OPS SPELLED SURVIVAL

By the late '60's, blacks on the land were in crisis. Some 4,500,000 had emigrated from the South since 1940. Denied equal opportunity by both public and private institutions, blacks all over the South who remained on the land saw their last chance for survival in cooperatives.

NSF's Rural Advancement Fund provided technical know-how and as much money as it could muster to co-ops in half a dozen states. Farming with seed and fertilizer bought at lower bulk prices meant a few extra dollars in the house to buy a child shoes or pay for a doctor's visit.

TOOLS ARE NEEDED TOO

But tools were also needed if their fields were really to bloom, lives to change, young people to stay home instead of fleeing to the cities. Tools like tractors and irrigation pumps cost money, and there was none. James Pierce, RAF/NSF's executive director, says:

"We decided to concentrate energy and funds in Burke and Halifax. Anybody who expects historically deprived poor people to make it on spirit and hard work alone doesn't understand today's farming. Millionaire farmers get huge subsidies. So do aircraft companies. We wanted to do as much as we could for people who had the will but not the way."

MEN AND MARKETS

RAF/NSF loans helped turn the tide in Burke, where the average black family income was under $700 a year, and in Halifax, among the poorest ten percent of American counties. But it takes people to make money work. RAF/NSF rolled up its collective sleeves along with co-op members.

Technical advice and markets were the key. NSF staff probed the complex world of marketing that had been alien to one-crop cotton and tobacco farmers. With co-op approval, they secured firm contracts from dependable brokers, good terms for machinery purchase, and the best technical help from agriculture experts. Specialists developed organic fertilizer with components from far and near. Elected co-op management teams worked with members on planting and harvesting schedules to insure that peas, squash, and cucumbers would be ready for market on time. All the things no individual could do alone became possible cooperatively.

"I'll tell you," says Woodrow Harvey. "When we hit the button on the irrigation pump and folks saw water bubbling out over fields that were ours, bringing them to life, that made a lot of believers."

The organic squash and cucumber crop in Halifax (fittingly grown near the grim, grey stubble of a long-abandoned tobacco field) made a lot of believers, too. And not just in the county. Buyers in New York and Washington liked what they saw and clamored for more.

TO BELIEVE IN THE FUTURE

None of the people in Burke or Halifax who lived through earlier years of hopelessness are crowing. They know the heavy odds against them. They count the friends who left, the babies who never grew into childhood. Loan obligations and expenditures for this dramatic year leave little money to acquire more land, vital to produce the volume that means profit in the marketplace. Still, with crops in and time to gather for discussions, ambitious plans are being made by the communities and RAF to raise up the entire community. RAF/NSF has labored with local people on housing plans, co-op food stores and sewing centers, day care and health facilities. No one knows where the money is coming from. But plans proceed. The habit of hope has replaced the acceptance of despair.

RAF/NSF wants to see this hope flourish in Burke and Halifax, and the lessons learned there spread to other counties where people have forgotten how to hope. At this moment, there are scores of places where families oppressed by poverty cannot believe in a hopeful future. Or in themselves. Belief can be restored and dignity returned by living the cooperative way. RAF/NSF would like to assist in restoring that belief. And the Halifax community would be pleased to share its slogan with any people ready and willing to make it their cooperative reality:

"We Ain't No Big Thing But We're Growing."

". . . then, or now, you are always back where you started"

". . . they who dwell there have named it the Eden of Louisiana . . ."
—Henry Wadsworth Longfellow

THE BAYOU COUNTRY of southeast Louisiana, celebrated in Longfellow's Evangeline, today presents a surface beauty rooted deep in human exploitation. Green rice shoots reflect in flooded and glistening fields, and sugarcane grows higher than a man. Place names like Bayou Vermillion and Atchafalaya are lyrics, and tourists admire the restored elegance of antebellum mansions.

But 1972's human reality is not so beautiful. Powerful interests hold 5,000 black plantation workers in ignorance and poverty. Louisiana has the nation's worst illiteracy rate, and in some southeastern parishes half the population cannot read or write. Ignorance breeds dependence, reduces humans to serfdom. Average plantation family income is $2,600 a year. What does that figure mean? It means a family eats on $4.76 a week.

They eat mainly beans and rice, are often overweight while undernourished. It means they live in a shack without a toilet. It means that barefoot children pick up hookworm in festering yards. Worm-riddled children in 20th Century America.

Part of what it means can be visited in a winter canefield in Iberia Parish (county) where a black cane-cutting crew eats lunch beside a tractor. Visitors driving up see a tableau reminiscent of cotton fields to the north in Mississippi: black workers on a white-owned plantation where white bosses still are called "overseers"; the workers' shacks at the cane's end, some inhabited since slavery days; further off, the plantation-owned mill looming like a cotton gin, where cane is reduced to sugar and other workmen are reduced to peonage.

From waterboy to driver

"I started in these fields as a waterboy," says 60-year-old Matt Parker, tractor driver. "Thirty-five cents a day then, for 14 hours. As I got a little bigger, I went to plowing with a mule for this plantation. Never no school. That was, let's see, 50 years ago. Now I get $1.65 an hour. So you could say things are a little better after 50 years. But then, or now, you are always back where you started."

Parker tells of raising six children in a company shack without plumbing, of insurmountable debt like doctors' bills with the latest installment a $320 tonsillectomy for his youngest daughter last year. The conversation echoes a timeless tale of southern agriculture, until one of the visitors introduces a new note. He is Gaston Dupas, a black field worker for the Southern Mutual Help Association (SMHA) which Rural Advancement Fund (RAF) has been assisting.

He tells the cutters of the just-opened

SMHA-sponsored family health clinic in Franklin, La. Membership is $1.00 a family, he explains; then doctor visits are free and operations can be arranged with charity (state) hospitals. There are also educational and nutrition programs and other services to combat decades of neglect. The cane workers have not heard of the clinic or of SMHA, and they doubt that anyone could care what happens to them or their children. But they are also anxious to believe there is some hope, particularly for their children.

Before lunch is over, most—not all—extract carefully folded dollar bills from their levis, and join the clinic. But more than clinic membership is transacted. A compact has been made between the workers and a community of concern that never existed for them before this day.

A dedicated minority

The Southern Mutual Help Association has been building this community for two years on those sprawling plantations where poverty lives side-by-side with rich and politically powerful growers supported by unlimited federal subsidies. The Department of Agriculture itself sets the wage for Parker and other field hands trapped in generations of servitude. It also pays huge subsidies to the growers, with six Louisiana growers collecting $500,000 a year each from the government.

Against these potent forces, a handful of women and men, black and white, alone keeps hope alive through SMHA. There is a local newspaperman fired because he wrote the truth about plantation exploitation, a mill worker who tried to unionize the fields two decades ago, a Head Start worker dismissed because she spoke out against discrimination in a region where black men are supposed to remain silent. And leading the group is Sister Anne Catherine, a French-born nun in whose Abbeville home hangs the slogan:

Almost always, the creative, dedicated minority has made the world better.

The work of Sister Anne and her "dedicated minority" is spread over eight parishes, taking many forms.

"From the first, the Rural Advancement Fund has been a vital ally," says Sister Anne. "Not only with funds but with advice on how to obtain the federal grants for things like the clinic and adult education. Southern Mutual Help Association is the sponsoring agency for several government-funded programs. But SMHA itself depends on RAF for its support. We look to the Rural Advancement Fund for the means to provide subsistence, travel expenses, and training of college students who take time out from their campus studies to work in teams with plantation workers, visiting people in their homes to bring help and hope."

There is the mother of eight needing help to get food stamps; a 70-year-old cane cutter with no schooling wanting to learn to read the Bible before he dies; a family with small children in a rodent-infested shack. An inability to cope is one more bitter by-product of lifelong poverty in the sugar fields.

SMHA's ability to inspire change is increasingly evident, not only in concrete programs but in a new will among the people that is intangible, yet no less real.

A community health clinic

The state's first migrant and plantation health center has just opened in Franklin with a pediatric nurse associate, a doctor, and several outreach workers. You are struck with the efficiency and cheerfulness of the center. There are bright yellow and orange curtains, gaily colored screens, handmade examination gowns in printed patterns. SMHA organized a health survey by Tulane University medical students who found on just one plantation only 37 out of 180 inhabitants in "normal" health. In warm, "barefoot" weather, 90 percent of the children surveyed had worms. HEW funds—along with community labor and donations—have created this cheerful spotless clinic.

The shacks of Lafourche

The shacks of Lafourche Parish contain living proof of the statistics of neglect. Thirty percent of the population lives under the poverty level, 40 percent has less than 4th grade education. Virtually all are black. But wrapped in the dark night of a lonely plantation road, one shack glows with new light. Inside, an adult education team is teaching those the "system" left ignorant. There are five such teams holding classes inside shacks, each team composed of qualified instructors who are student volunteers from Antioch College and one plantation resident whose education enables him or her to help out. In one rough-walled room lit by a bare bulb, a middle-aged woman sits on the floor, leaning on a chair, learning to write her name. With great difficulty, she makes the letters while the team's plantation "specialist" encourages her.

Tired eyes opening

Next door, younger women have brought their children to class. An infant stirs, cries, is comforted by its mother. She has five children, her husband is a tractor driver at $1.65 an hour, and sometimes she cuts cane by hand.

"Most nights I am tired in the class," she says. "But I never went beyond fourth grade and the lessons perk me up. They—you know—open my eyes."

Later a mill worker and SMHA member, Henry Pelet, tries to describe his feelings about the education program he directs. And about other things.

"I've lived in this cane area all my life," he says. "And I haven't liked the things I've seen. Today, we are starting to change it. This young lady from the plantation instructing tonight is going to Tuskegee Institute this week to study so she'll be better trained to teach. A year ago, all she faced is what her family has always known—a life in the fields or on the fringe. SMHA is making possible one very small advance with miles and miles ahead. We need so much more. And we're struggling to get there."

The Rural Advancement Fund underpins SMHA's survival and growth, gives encouragement to the new-found hope for change on bayou and plantation. Clinics to give bodies a chance to grow and be strong, education programs to open minds and enable them to confidently make their choices for the future, day care centers where children have supervised play and wholesome meals while their mothers work, credit unions to encourage savings and provide low-interest loans for essentials, new homes to replace decrepit shacks.

And all of it developing that sense of community that is the vital first step the rural poor must take in their struggle for the decencies of life the rest of us take for granted. We ask you to share in these efforts by helping to provide resources for the people of southeast Louisiana who today are finding the will to build new lives and are earnestly seeking the way, and for RAF's programs in other poor rural areas for farmer cooperatives, craft co-ops, leadership training, housing, and other social and economic programs to help people help themselves.

INTERGROUP RELATIONS WORKSHOPS

NOTICE

TO: Executives of Affiliates of the National Social Welfare Assembly
Participants at May 18, 1954 Conference on School Desegregation

The Assembly Committee on Intergroup Relations is planning for a series of workshops with the following purpose:

> To provide an opportunity for NSWA affiliates to come together so that they may exchange views, make a study of and an inquiry into the practical aspects of organizational function and administrative policy and practice relating to their endeavors to eliminate prejudice and discrimination.

* * *

The first workshops of the series will be held this spring:

April 20 from 2:00 P.M. to 4:30 P.M.

June 16 from 10:00 A.M. to 4:00 P.M.

> "It was felt that leadership, professional and volunteer, is basic to progress in intergroup relations, thus it is essential that national organizations give attention to training programs for their local as well as national personnel on such matters as-- > a. leadership attitudes, need for personal conviction and support
> b. methods and practices in intergroup relations
> c. minority group personnel, to look into the ways we need to work to assure more opportunities for placement, for upgrading, especially into administrative positions, and the need to increase opportunities for staff development of persons of minority groups."

Save these dates:

April 20

June 16

Dear Bernice:

I have run down the earlier correspondence with Dr. Mitchell and Robert Snable, the Chairman of the Young Adult Council.

Dr. Mitchell regrets that it is not possible for him to attend the meeting. The Council has very limited funds so it is not possible to give financial assistance to help young people attend this meeting. I enclose, however, a list of the staff of such stat state groups affiliated with the Southern Regional Council as are organized and staffed. I believe it would be useful for information about the Assembly to be sent to them in case they know of young people's groups which should be represented.

In the event that you are looking for suggestions of people from the Southern region who might serve as consultants or in some other leadership capacity, the following suggestions may be useful.

(1) Mrs. Margaret Dagen, 1579 Parsons Place, N.W., Louisville 5, Kentucky (Present executive of the Kentucky Council; teacher in the Highland Junior High School, Louisville; excellent working relationships with great variety of community groups involved in the process of education for school desegregation.)

(2) Dr. C.H. Parrish, Department of Sociology, University of Louisville, Ky. (A consultant for state organizations of the SRC; Vice-Chairman of the Kentucky Council on Human Relations affiliated with the SRC; regular relationships with a great variety of local and national groups concerned with preparation for school desegregation.)

(3) Mrs. Bonita Valien, 339 21st Ave., N., Nashville, Tenn. (Consultant on the staff of Southern Educational Reporting Service; also served as one of the research team which studied the communities reported in Schools in Transition.)

You probably know of the community consultants who have worked this year for the NAACP in communities actively preparing for desegregation of the schools. Mrs. Margaret Butcher is one of the best and I believe might be interested and able to work with the Assembly.

I expect to be in New York during the month of June and will look forward to an opportunity for conversation. I regret that the Council is not in a position to be of more help in the ways in which you hope to find help.

Yours Cordially,

Dear Grace:

Some time ago our Young Adult Council addressed a letter to Mr. Mitchell inviting the Southern Regional Council's cooperation in the United States Assembly of Youth to be held at Oberlin College, September 8-13, 1955. So far we have had no reply.

I thought perhaps it would be helpful if I were to supplement the Young Adult Council chairman's letter by explaining to you two ways in which we would welcome your Council's cooperation.

1. The extension of an invitation to young adults in the 18-30 age group to attend USAY. We assume that in the local groups with which you come in contact there are young people of this age group and they would be the kind of people who would be particularly interested in the discussions at USAY. If there is any help you folks could give such young people in helping to plan financial arrangements, that, too, would be helpful.

2. The USAY Planning Committee would welcome the news that the Southern Regional Council can send one of its experienced staff workers to serve as a resource consultant in the discussions for which the Council's experience would be particularly helpful. There are several commissions and clinics which will be concerned with various angles of discrimination and segregation. I don't know whether Mr. Mitchell feels he could spare the time to come to USAY. I am sure it would be exciting to the young people to have the opportunity to meet with him. If he cannot do so, it would be wonderful if we might have you there.

Bonita Valien
C. H. Pawne
Margaret Dayne

The major difficulty in this invitation is that we are working on a very limited budget and are seeking resource consultants from organizations which see sufficient value in USAY to be willing to send their staff workers to help with the program at the organization's expense. In other words, we are unable to offer any financial assistance.

When is your next trip to New York? It's been a long time since we've had the opportunity for conversation, so come soon.

Sincerely yours,

Bernice

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

The Young Adult Council invites your cooperation in the United States Assembly of Youth to be held September 8-13, 1955 at Oberlin College, Oberlin, Ohio. The theme for this year's USAY is "Freedom in the Balance." We feel you will share our enthusiasm for USAY - an assembly of some 350 young Americans for discussion of the most pressing issues facing citizens today.

USAY is sponsored by the Young Adult Council of the National Social Welfare Assembly, a central national council of sixteen major Catholic, Protestant, Jewish, student, rural and young worker organizations in the United States. Participants will be young adult members (18-30 years) and adult leaders of organizations affiliated with or invited by YAC to cooperate in USAY.

We feel that your organization will be interested in the discussions at USAY and hope you will wish to send two observers from your staff or lay leadership. It is quite possible that these observers will be qualified to serve as resource persons in various discussion groups at the Assembly. The enclosed memorandum indicates the general areas of discussion.

We have prepared a brochure for distribution in the near future. If you wish to have a supply to make available to young adult members of your organization who might wish to participate in the Assembly, please return the enclosed post card.

We will be happy to provide any additional information you may desire, and hope to receive your favorable response to this invitation as soon as possible.

UNITED STATES ASSEMBLY OF YOUTH

September 8-13, 1955

Oberlin College Oberlin, Ohio

PURPOSE: To bring together from all parts of the United States rural and urban students and workers, 18 to 30 years of age, of all creeds and colors and all major organizations - to get acquainted and make new friends, and to do some serious thinking about our democratic heritage and the responsibility of citizens in community, national and world affairs.

PROGRAM: Theme - "Freedom in the Balance"
Commissions will deal with the citizen: his well-being; his political responsibilities; his role in the world community
Clinics for practical program aids
Special Events for pleasure

Outstanding speakers and expert resource consultants will contribute both information and stimulation. After the 1953 USAY a participant remarked "USAY was equal to a semester at college and much more fun!" We anticipate that the 1955 USAY will measure up equally well.

ELIGIBLE: Young Adults (18-30) who are members of YAC organizations listed below or other invited organizations.

HOUSING: University dormitories. Space is reserved for single men, single women and married couples. Meals will be served in University dining rooms.

COST: Registration fee - $10 (until June 30); $12.50 (after July 1)
Meals and Room - $35, from dinner, Thursday September 8th to lunch, Tuesday, September 13th.

Part time participants will be charged the full $35 unless precise information about late arrival or early departure is registered with the YAC office by September 1.

TRAVEL: Oberlin is 25 miles from Cleveland and 10 miles from Elyria, Ohio. Buses leave Cleveland or Elyria for Oberlin approximately every hour from 7:00 a.m. to midnight.

BRING: Simple clothing - sportswear, slacks, jeans. There will be special evening events but no formal parties.

If you like tennis, bring your racquet and tennis balls.

Musical instruments for informal sings will add pleasure.

APPLICATION FORMS: Forms may be requested from your own organization or directly from the Young Adult Council. Send the completed form, with registration fee, to YAC.

Bulletin No. 3 March 15, 1955

INTERGROUP RELATIONS BULLETIN

FOR SOCIAL WELFARE AGENCIES

(Issued periodically by *The Committee on Intergroup Relations)

Social welfare agencies have for many years been pioneering for the elimination of prejudice and discrimination - a trend which has been accelerated by the Supreme Court Decision of May 1954.

The projects briefly outlined in this issue illustrate directions which the movement for the improvement of intergroup relations has taken and which have been facilitated by agencies in the social welfare field. The examples included are not intended to be exhaustive, but merely suggestive and illustrative, and to serve as source material for further information to those who seek it.

This issue is devoted primarily to sundry examples of projects being carried on by such groups as Community Chests and Councils of America, Inc.; National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A.; National Urban League; Young Women's Christian Association of the United States of America; and the National Conference of Social Work.

Subsequent issues of the Intergroup Relations Bulletin will carry supportive examples of projects and programs developed by other groups.

*(formerly The Committee on Prejudice and Discrimination)

(The cost of the Bulletin is 8¢ per issue; 50 or more copies 6¢ per issue)

WELFARE AGENCY PROJECTS IN PROCESS

COMMUNITY CHESTS AND COUNCILS OF AMERICA, INC.
(345 East 46 St., New York 17, N.Y.)

In recent years, increasing attention has been given in local community chests and councils to the problems of promoting better intergroup relations among racial and religious groups in the community.

A number of Community Welfare Councils, some in the South, have made comprehensive studies of services and facilities available to Negroes, employment opportunities, public attitudes, and the areas of community life where improvement in race relations should be made. Examples are: Akron, Ohio; Charleston, West Virginia; Gary, Indiana; Greenville, South Carolina; Jacksonville, Florida; Shreveport, Louisiana; and Springfield, Illinois. (See detailed descriptions below).

Community Chests
Denver, Colorado

The Denver Community Chest tackled the problem of continuing distribution of funds to the Metropolitan YMCA - when it was disclosed that the Sportland Beach Branch - was practicing discrimination in its membership. The executive committee of the Chest, with the full cooperation of the YMCA, sought the facts, got them, drew conclusions and made recommendations distinguished for their frankness, brevity and lack of rancor. The specific recommendations were:

1. That Chest financial support be continued for the Metropolitan YMCA with the continued understanding that none thereof be re-allocated to or used by or for the Sportland Beach Branch;
2. That the Metropolitan YMCA continue and intensify its efforts toward a program of complete racial equality in all its branches;
3. That the Metropolitan YMCA avoid any further arrangements with any branch whose operations are not consistent with Community Chest and YMCA policies.

Community Welfare Councils
Greenville, South Carolina

The Greenville Study was made in May 1950. It was entitled "Everybody's Business." More than two hundred citizens actively participated in the collection of facts and in making recommendations. Annual follow-up reports refer to this project as "Greenville's Big Idea." The 1953 edition reported that ninety-three specific improvements had taken place, either while the Study was being made or since the Study was completed.

Jacksonville, Florida

A Follow-Up Committee catalogued a wide range of improvements twenty-one months after the publication of the Jacksonville Survey. The report of the Follow-Up Committee comments: "Many of the following constructive developments were specific recommendations made by the Survey Committee. Other improvements would seem to have been facilitated by the better atmosphere, wider understanding and discussions since the Study."

St. Louis, Missouri

A Committee on Goals for Non-Discrimination was set up within the Social Planning Council of St. Louis and St. Louis County. Various goals were outlined and approved by the Board of Directors May 11, 1954. The functions of the Committee are:

a. to submit periodic reports to the Board of progress in the elimination of discrimination in health, welfare, and recreation agencies;
b. to compile a body of experience from agencies on problems and techniques in eliminating discrimination;
c. to use this experience in conferring with staffs and/or boards of agencies whose policies and practices are at variance with the Goals, and who desire change; and,
d. to develop, in cooperation with other community agencies, an educational program for the elimination of discrimination in health, welfare, and recreation agencies in particular, and in the broader community in general.

Shreveport, Louisiana

The Shreveport Study of 1953 was a truly outstanding self survey which had a terrific impact upon the community while it was being conducted and has already led to widespread improvement in the situation. This Study was given TV coverage by Edward R. Murrow.

Springfield, Illinois

An evaluation made in Springfield, Illinois two years after the original study listed eighteen specific changes for the better which had occurred during the intervening period. This report makes the following disclaimer: "We are not listing these as accomplishments because we cannot claim the entire credit for bringing anyone or all of these changes about. However, the committee as a whole, or individual members of the committee, took an active part in every one."

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF SOCIAL WORK
(22 West Gay St., Columbus 15, O.)

The National Conference of Social Work, at the 1955 Annual Forum in San Francisco, May 29-June 5, will consider the general topic of "Segregation, Desegregation and Integration." One of the General Sessions and several sectional sessions will deal with the subject. The speaker at the General Session will be George S. Mitchell, Executive Director, Southern Regional Council.

Section I (Services to Individuals and Families) will have a series of group meetings related to the whole subject.

1. The school situation. A school social worker will report on the integration of the Negro child into the public school and all its attending adjustments.
2. Social agencies - public and voluntary. Problems and practices in attempting to work out nonsegregated caseloads, etc. will be explored.
3. Public housing. Discussion on segregation and desegregation will be based on the work of the Housing Authority of Baltimore.
4. American Indians. The segregation aspects - including education, housing, etc. - will be discussed. D'Arcy McNickle, Director of The American Indian Development, Denver, Colorado, is the speaker.
5. Migratory group. Specific segregation problems of this group will be defined. Joseph H. Douglass, Assistant to the Assistant Secretary, U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare, Washington, D.C., is the speaker.

The Eduard C. Lindeman memorial lecture will also deal with desegregation and integration. The speaker will be Dr. Ira De A. Reid, Chairman of the Department of Sociology, Haverford College, Haverford, Pennsylvania.

Section II (Services to Groups and Individuals in Groups) will have a meeting on the contribution of group work in racial integration. The speaker will be Dorothy Height of the staff of the YWCA of the USA.

Section III (Services to Agencies and Communities) will have a panel discussion on the question of what social work can do to help our schools meet the problems of desegregation, including suggested ways of bringing social work and the schools closer together within the community. Presiding at this panel will be: Benjamin E. Youngdahl, Dean; George Warren Brown, School of Social Work, Washington University, St. Louis, Missouri. Panel members are: M. Leo Bohanon, Executive Director of the Urban League of St. Louis; and Miss Margaret W. Ryan, Texas Research League, Austin, Texas.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE USA
(297 Fourth Ave., New York 16, N.Y.)

The United Lutheran Church in America, the Congregational Christian Churches and the Presbyterian Church in the USA, their social action commissions, cooperated with the Center for Human Relations Studies, New York University, and the Department of Racial and Cultural Relations, NCC, to examine the processes through which local congregations of their own groups had moved toward, or had achieved some degree of racial inclusiveness in their own churches and organizations. The project is now nearing completion.

The National Council of Churches in a strongly worded message addressed to the 35,500,000 members of its 30 constituent communions, has denounced "any and all forms" of racial prejudice as a "sin - contrary to the will and design of God." The 500-word text was coupled with a 16-point outline of suggested steps to be taken by local churches and individuals in combating prejudice and discriminatory practices.

NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE
(1133 Broadway, New York 10, N.Y.)

The National Urban League received $7,500 from the Philip Murray Memorial Foundation to assist the League in launching its "southern industry project" aimed at increasing the industrial employment of Negroes. Formal presentation of the grant was made by Emil Rieve, president of the Textile Workers Union (CIO) and chairman of the Foundation, to Robert W. Dowling, League president.

The southern industry project is one of the League's answers to the problems of new community relationships and attitudes resulting from the Supreme Court's decision on school segregation. The project seeks to increase the number and improve the work levels of Negro labor in industrial plants and businesses located in the South.

Oklahoma City Urban League

Here is an indication of plans underway in one League City - Oklahoma City - to implement the Supreme Court Decision in Desegregation of Public Schools. Because of its careful planning and the way in which the proposals are suggested, it appeared to be valuable for use in many League communities.

Five committees have been established:

1. Consultation and conference with school officials and representatives of influence groups.
2. Citizens' Committee to coordinate community groups.
3. Community Leadership Institute.
4. Speakers' Bureau.
5. Preparation of instructional material.

Washington Urban League

The Washington Urban League, in cooperation with other civic-minded organizations, met the student strikes against public school integration in the following manner:

1. Served as an observer at three high schools and reported to the cooperating group meeting.
2. Initiated efforts to secure newspaper editorials condemning the truancy.
3. Participated in group discussions formulating plans of action.

4. Served as promoter and coordinator of group activities, alerting the Federation of Churches, notifying groups not represented at meetings of the recommendations for action, and so on.
5. Participated in drawing up the proposals on school-community relations presented to the School Superintendent after the strikes ceased.
6. Sent messages of commendation to the Superintendent, the Commissioners, the Chief of Police and the newspapers.

Future activities will deal with three areas: integration of school administration, implementation of proposals, and improvement of neighborhood attitudes.

YWCA, NATIONAL BOARD
(600 Lexington Ave., New York 22, N.Y.)

The National Board will present for action to the 20th National Convention of the YWCA of USA the following recommendation:

"That during the next triennium, each local Association and the National Board review its progress toward inclusiveness since the adoption of the Interracial Charter in 1946, and, to assist this, that materials be prepared and sent to local Associations by the National Board.

"That local Associations and the National Board, on the basis of progress already made, decide upon concrete forward steps to be taken between now and the 1958 Convention, and that a summary of effective experience be reported to the Convention in 1958."

The members of the National Board voted in the October 1954 meeting that the National Board receive and approve the National Social Welfare Assembly's May 18, 1954 Statement on Integration. Special meetings were set up in order that Board members might have the opportunity to take a nation-wide look at current YWCA practices in community situations, for the purpose of considering what steps the YWCA might take to further the processes of desegregation.

In December 1954, the YWCA of USA prepared a descriptive record of its experiences in a report entitled "Methods of Combating Discrimination." This was prepared at the request of the World YWCA, for participation in a Conference of non-governmental organizations under the sponsorship of the Subcommission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities of the Commission on Human Rights of the United Nations.

Further, the Southern Regional National Board and staff members met in Atlanta, Georgia in December 1954 to assess the changing conditions in the South and their implications for the YWCA.

In January 1955 selected National Board and staff members participated in a consultation on desegregation in the YWCA. At that time work groups considered matters relating to (1) leadership; (2) electoral practices and policies; (3) branches; (4) relationships to the community.

From the above consultation came specific recommendations to the National Board of the YWCA.

Dear Mrs. Bridges:

I wish that I or someone else from here could attend the National Teenage Conference on Human Rights. I am afraid, however, that we shall not be able to make it this year. This far in advance I do not know whether any of our people would be in the New York-Princeton vicinity at the time, and I am afraid that we could not otherwise manage the travel expenses.

You have a very interesting program, and a very worthwhile purpose. We wish you all success.

Dear Mr. Dunbar:

The National Social Welfare Assembly will sponsor a National Teenage Conference on Human Rights to be held August 17 - 21, 1964 at Princeton University. Participants will be high school age members of national organizations from various states over the nation and their adult advisers.

On Wednesday morning, August 19, from 9:00 A.M. to 12:00 Noon, we would like to have the participants introduced to some of the leading direct action organizations. Would there be any person in New York or nearby who is sufficiently well informed about the Southern Regional Council activities that you would wish them to serve as spokesman for the organization at the August 19 morning meeting?

We would like to have the action organization representatives present for the full morning, 9:00 A.M. to 12:00 Noon. Our plan is to have a panel chairman to raise questions so that the panel members can respond in preference to having a series of straight speeches.

Points we shall hope to have covered include: purpose and methods of the organization, examples of current activities, the role of youth in the organization, and any suggestions you have about what teenagers can do in their own organizations, schools, and communities in efforts to assure equal rights and equal access to opportunities.

We are planning this conference without any special funds and therefore are unable to pay expenses for a representative to come from the South. However, we are told that some of your well-informed leaders are often in New York for other purposes. We can, of course, cover expense of transportation between New York and Princeton.

We shall appreciate your consideration of this inquiry,

Sincerely,

Bernice Bridges

Dear Mrs. Bridges:

Thank you for renewing the invitation to us to be represented at your Princeton meeting on August 19. Your suggestion of Paul Rilling is an intriguing one, but I think it would not be fair to Paul, who now works for a governmental agency and has all the problems of identity which that entails, to represent us on such a panel. About all I can say is that we certainly shall not forget the dates, and if anyone happens to be up that way at the time, we shall let you know.

Thank you for your good wishes, and we are sorry that we probably cannot this time work with you, as we have so enjoyably done in the past.

Dear Dr. Dunbar:

Earlier this spring we wrote you that the National Social Welfare Assembly will sponsor a National Teenage Conference on Human Rights, August 17-21, 1964 at Princeton University.

We asked if any representative of the Southern Regional Council would be in the New York area and available to participate in a panel of representatives of some of the direct action organizations on the morning of Wednesday, August 19 from 9:00 a.m. to 12:00 noon. At that time you knew of no one who would be up this way.

Since it is now mid-July, I thought it might be worthwhile to recheck this question with you in case someone has had a change of plans. You may remember that our problem is a too tight budget which prevents our inviting a representative directly from Atlanta.

One other thought occurred which may or may not be useful. Paul Rilling, Executive Director, D.C. Commissioners' Council on Human Relations, is coming to Princeton to help with another discussion on the afternoon of August 19. I think someone said he was formerly with the Southern Regional Council but I do not know how long ago. We have not mentioned the morning panel to Mr. Rilling but wanted you to have the information.

This second inquiry is merely that we, out of the several different associations (foreign visitors, U.S. Youth Council, etc.) have high regard for the work of your organization and will regret the absence of a panelist due to our own budget limitations.

Sincerely yours,

Bernice Bridges

WHERE ARE WE GOING IN CIVIL RIGHTS

by

Dr. Robert W. Spike

I am pleased to share with you this noon time my views on the subject that has been assigned, "Where Are We Going in Civil Rights?" This is exactly the question I am asking myself. This will be an exploration rather than prophetic.

I am reminded of the story of a four-year-old boy who came in to his mother with his face covered with lather and said he was going to shave. His mother said to him, "But, John, you don't know how to shave."

He said, "Yes, I do. I have been listening to Daddy, and I know all of the right words."

The kind of words that I use come out of the very deep involvement that our Commission has in the middle of the struggle. But there are times when these words, these observations, and analysis, bear about as much relationship to the dynamics of the movement we are now a part of as the boy's observation about what it takes to shave.

To speak at all intelligently about where we are going in civil rights, we have to remind ourselves if only very briefly about where we have come, and then to speak a bit about the recent center of tension and dramatic focus, namely, in Selma. On the basis of these two things we can talk about the immediate future and some very long range and wild guesses about the longer future.

The Struggle for Equality - Three Periods

The struggle for full equality in this country from the point of view of the Negro people can very well be divided into three periods - and they are periods of very great and very profound unevenness.

The first period would certainly be two hundred to two hundred fifty years ago, more or less from the beginnings of our nation up to the time of the Civil War, when slavery particularly in the hundred years just preceding the Civil War was a matter of course, a matter of acceptance, not only in certain regions of the country but in the whole country. True, there are those who make the point - and with some justification - that the very founders of our nation, those who drew up our basic documents of freedom, probably had in the back of their minds that these documents excluded Negro people because Negroes were thought of first as property, and then second as persons. So you have to think of this whole long heritage of relationships between the races in this country, which still carries its mark and is buried deep in the psyche of the nation.

The next period is the one hundred years from the Civil War roughly into our own time, which was characterized by the heroic and in many ways unbelievable struggle of the Negro people to bring themselves into the full stream of American life. Having been emancipated from slavery by fiat, there were no assurances of acceptance into white society. Indeed soon after the promulgation of legal rights, the white society set out to establish a whole new range of obstacles and barriers that would nullify that freedom. These one hundred years have largely been characterized by heroic attempts at education and self education, of advancement against tremendous pressure. They represent a long and historic struggle.

The third period has to begin at least symbolically with the Supreme Court decision on school desegregation in 1954. I am afraid that when the history of all of these events is written that will seem to be almost the beginning as far as generations that come. Those heroic souls who have struggled for civil rights in the last twenty or twenty-five years are largely unnoticed in the whole national picture. For 1954 was the date which becomes a kind of axis in the struggle. With that decision of the Supreme Court, Brown versus the Board of Education, one has symbolized for the first time since the Civil War the determination of the Federal Government, in this case in the existence of the Supreme Court decision, to move positively and strike away the subterfuges of states rights which have been used so overwhelmingly and often with so much deception to prevent people from exercising their full constitutional rights.

The decade 1954-1964 really spawned what we know now as the freedom movement, the civil rights movement, in that great numbers of people have been added to the group of those who struggled before that largely in the Urban League and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. There is a proliferation of new organizations, and finally very belatedly the entrance of larger numbers of white people into the struggle for justice.

The Churches Enter the Struggle

It is in that latter vein that the churches, as far as their organizational life and strength, have to be numbered. It is not, of course, true that the churches have paid no attention to the basic issues of justice over the years. If you could look in our office you would find piles of documents of pronouncements the church bodies have made on this subject for a great many years. If you have had commissions and agencies valiantly at work, we have had all kinds of individuals, even as the social welfare agencies and other institutions of our society concerned with human welfare. But it was not until 1963 that the churches at least of this country decided that the issue was so drawn, and the crisis so deep in the life of America, that nothing less than the fullest sort of mobilization of resources and energies was called for.

It became apparent, probably for the first time to large numbers of white people in the spring of 1963 following the demonstrations in Birmingham that the nation was not just being plagued by an uncomfortable social problem that affected a few people, but that it was in the midst of an internal crisis which might indeed split the nation; that there was facing the nation a determined and intensely devoted Negro population which would not rest until all doors were open, until all barriers, whether bounded by legal restrictions or whether bounded by the more subtle and covert pressures and customs of our society, were down. When that finally became real to this nation, largely symbolized by the willingness of hundreds of people to march in the street and to go to jail in the City of Birmingham at personal risk and cost to themselves, we had the opening we now have.

The period of demonstration, of desperate taking to the streets the issues of justice, has served an enormously useful purpose in this country. This period brought to us, with the events that followed these demonstrations, a major piece of civil rights legislation. The demonstrations have convinced the conservative institutions of this country, at least on superficial top layers, that strenuous and active campaigns had to be instituted within their own life to make it possible for Negro people to find full equality in these institutions.

There was coming to be - and I put this in the immediate past tense - there was coming to be felt in civil rights organizations, and those who were most engaged in the struggle last summer, and fall, and winter, the feeling that the time of the usefulness of demonstrations had passed; that these demonstrations which had produced certain major breakthroughs had also worn thin on the American scene, and that except for the most militant of the civil rights groups there was a desire to try to find some new ways of attacking those areas of the problem that still remained.

The feeling was that demonstrations when they do capture the imagination of people and dramatize the issue need to be followed through by very careful planning and careful work so that the whole business of people having political power, of organizing in the community in order to get that political power, that these were the efforts that now needed to be made to achieve the remaining tasks. These remaining areas which are so seriously still with us are the areas of open housing, of educational equality and quality, of the balancing of opportunity in terms of jobs and political strength.

These are the areas that people had begun to move to. There was the conviction expressed in most civil rights groups in the middle of the winter that major attention should be focused in the more complicated Northern cities.

This was certainly true with the Commission on Religion and Race, the organization that I serve. We had decided in the fall to concentrate more of our energies and attention in the North than in the South. We had been very deeply engaged in Mississippi and other parts of the South, and we now felt that the more complicated and probably in the long run the more serious issues that needed working at were in Northern cities.

Then in the midst of our careful plans, Dr. King began to organize in Selma. The State Troopers of Alabama, as if they had been on Dr. King's payroll, proceeded to escalate the seriousness of that situation by their terrifying kind of brutality and almost stupid resistance to the legitimate exercise of rights. They made Selma a central symbol of indignation and protest. Again I have to speak just about our own organization, but I think others were affected the same way. It was impossible for us to keep on with our plans of analysis and preparation and careful planning of what we were going to do in this Northern city, and that Northern city. We found ourselves coordinating and transporting hundreds and finally thousands of church people to Selma.

Five Results of Selma

It was not something that we planned or that we even urged. It was the spontaneous overflow of deep feeling that had to have some kind of expression. Out of Selma have come at least five remarkable results which I would like to call to your attention.

First, the attention of the whole nation was drawn sympathetically and applied to the Negro freedom seeker in a way that has not been true since Birmingham. Indeed the indignation and moral revulsion felt by all of the intervening tragedies was even greater than Birmingham. People felt compelled to do something. Thousands who poured into Selma dramatized that deep feeling, and those of us who were standing on the deck trying to focus the indignation constructively felt the sheer weight of it.

After I finally got back from Selma and Washington, where I had gone directly after the attempted march with Dr. King, the one that was turned back after eight days, I finally got back to my office. There I found three typed pages, single spaced, of groups of people who wanted to go to Selma. We had to say, "Don't go because there are too many people there already." These were not individuals. These were lists of groups, and the groups consisted of people all the way from 5 to 400. This was a spontaneous kind of feeling.

The sympathetic marchers on Sunday, March 14, all across the nation were another sign. In the middle of that Sunday afternoon it seemed as if fully half of the nation was on the street marching some place. The nation was opened again for drastic movement of Selma.

Second, the Federal Government became more irrevocably committed to an active role in the struggle than ever before, passing by its fears of contravening historic rights reserved by tradition if not by statute to the states.

Third, the President, himself, passed through his own valley of decision, and he emerged for the first time convincingly as a moral leader of the freedom struggle. I suppose every President has to have this. President Kennedy had his Oxford. This was the first time that President Johnson had been personally and deeply involved and had to make his own kind of drastic decision.

Fourth, Selma makes possible the passage of a stronger voting rights bill than we could have hoped for, along with the possibility of other legislation which will strengthen the Federal authority in crimes resulting from civil rights issues. These are bills yet to be drawn. I am quite sure they will be drawn before the year is over.

Fifth, and this is of particular concern to those of us in the religious community. Selma was a major breakthrough for those in the Roman Catholic Church who are deeply concerned about civil rights. The Roman Catholic presence in Selma on the days after the aborted Tuesday march was one of its most impressive features.

Other Results and Effects

Now having enumerated all of these aspects of victory, however, I must honestly say that my overwhelming feeling about the effects of Selma is fearfulness. Despite the spontaneous expression from the whole country, I have the feeling that it was an over-reaction, that it was generated out of guilt and frustration long building and found an easy emotional release in the treks to Selma.

I do not in any way undervalue the importance of the struggle for freedom that went on there, and that was represented by Dr. King's program. I am not talking about that at all. But I am more troubled than reassured when popular television shows reek sentimentality and patriotic poetry dedicated to the whole civil rights movement as I heard right after Selma. And when certain great hierarchial leaders who have had no previous connection or even public statement about civil rights announced that no price is too great to pay, no sacrifice too painful, no labor too demanding to help the American Negro achieve his full civil rights. Or when every political figure now finds it the right thing to do to join marchers or send representatives to Montgomery. In some ways this may be the state toward which we have been working, that is the taking up into the popular American culture of the Negro freedom movement. It may be, but I am too wary of our notorious weakness for fads to believe it too easily.

We are people who like symbols of freedom. Selma to Montgomery represented that. But for some it seemed a little too much like a refighting of the Civil War. The temptation to vindictiveness against the South rather than being personally forced to repentance is dangerously present in the North right now. When I use the word "repentance" I don't mean it in its narrowest ecclesiastical sense. For many, Selma has been an escape from the hard and complicated decisions in Northern cities where freedom is also at stake. The very days that crucial decisions ought to have been made for sustained plans for this summer, for example, many were on trains and planes bound for Montgomery.

In many ways the reaction to Selma in Northern communities is not immediately definable. Bitterness and frustration in the North are shared by the white villians in Alabama. But the remedy which will emerge from Selma, namely, a voting bill, will not be felt in the North. This is the same kind of thing that came out of the struggle of events that produced the Civil Rights Bill. There are very close relationships to Mississippi, the production of that bill and the enormous sense of frustration and bitterness that emerged and broke out in Northern cities last summer. For the remedy that comes forth on the national medium does not in any way affect the situation that Negroes face in ghetto situations.

There is a dangerous kind of sentimentality bred by all of the public attention given to the events in Alabama. The churches particularly and the clergy need committed prophetic ministers. But we need even more skilled hard working clergy and laity who will work at basic political reform, economic opportunity and the changing of housing patterns.

Questions Raised by Selma

That is the sober picture as I see it for the months that immediately face us now. How can the commitment of Selma, that many people felt who were there and many who did not go but actually felt it, how can it be channeled into the very complicated and yet essential bed rock tasks of changing the patterns of relationships, particularly in the Northern cities?

I don't want to be too pessimistic, and I don't think I am. But I am sure that enough changes cannot be made in these next few months to prevent outbreaks of bitterness and perhaps of violence in a great many places in the North. History just does not move that fast. I see a great many people working at the job.

In fact as I move among the cities of the North I am alarmed by all of the cross purposes and hostilities and jealousies of prerogatives that emerge. This is the most obvious picture you have about the North where there are so many agencies and organizations committed by charter to the extension of human rights. How often they seem to be at cross purposes, or at least suspicious, of one another. How fearful of the new forces that are emerging, particularly the more indigenous voices, the more Negro militant leadership. These somehow will not fit in neatly to the patterns of social work organization in the city or of the political structure of the city.

That kind of tension and opposition is going to increase. And unless it is worked out, unless these newer voices - some of them not as skilled, some of them without degrees behind their tones and voices - are listened to, then we will not get very far.

I also have a feeling that even though the base of support for the civil rights movement as a whole has been greatly widened by these last few years, and again by Selma, there is also a deepening of quiet resistance within the conservative institutions of this country, despite what seems to be going on on the top levels, on the public image levels.

One sign of this is the resurgence of attacks on parts of the civil rights movement as being Communist or being influenced by far left people. There is too much of this, and it is too apparent in the last six weeks particularly for it to be completely accidental.

There are groups of people, some of them also engaged in the civil rights struggle, who would very much like to tone down, tame down, anything, the more militant part of the movement. If that is accomplished by insinuation and by weeding out certain people from the movement, then we are on our way to developing in this nation a permanent - permanent may be too strong - a long term alienated group of people who will be outside of the consensus of the American scene as far as the direction of the society is concerned.

These people will not be submerged nor pushed aside by these threats. The surest way to develop a long time irresponsible kind of negative radical movement is to begin to weed people out of the civil rights struggle at this stage. It is very serious, and I think it is one of the signs to keep watching.

The other sign: there is deepening resistance to serving the institutions in this country. I would include most of the institutions that all of us represent in this room in that category. One of the signs is the increasing difficulty of financing for basic pragmatic programs of social change.

One of the shocking things is the way in which the major foundations of this country are unable to mobilize their resources in that basic problem. They can find the money for anything that seems to be educational - in quotes - which must always somehow be certified that it is not threatening the present balance of the social structures we have. Yet the meaning of this civil rights struggle we are now in is that it is a major opening wedge for a long time process of basic social change: the struggle as to whether in a democracy encased in a complicated technological society these changes can be made fast enough and with enough freedom so that all people have a share in the benefits of democracy.

This is not just a struggle about Negroes and their historic plight, which is serious and bad enough. Out of it is emerging a much deeper and very healthy change: a movement for freedom in its true sense. That is the exercise of equality and opportunity for the whole range of the citizenry within and accepting the technological facts of our time.

We should give thanks that in our age - when it looked as if all of the frontiers were closed, and when all of the red blooded traits of American youth were going to be shunted into climbing into telephone booths or pushing beds down the street - that there has emerged a young and virile and militant Negro generation that has opened the door for the white kids to come along with them. If we close the door to them and do not understand the seriousness of what it is they are engaged in, and if we do not join them with our resources and with our responsible wisdom, then we will have failed our country.

WILLIAM H. BULKELEY President WINSLOW CARLTON Chairman Board of Directors ROBERT E. BONDY Director

Report of The Treasurer to the 1965 Annual Meeting of The Assembly

Eugene J. Patton

The financial situation within The Assembly has always been reasonably tight. In our first year back in 1946 the income was about $63,000 and our expenses were about $59,000, so in that first year we started off with a surplus of some $4,000. Until 1960 our income has matched our expenses. It had to be that way. In the last four years, however, our expenses exceeded our income and we had to borrow from the banks.

In reporting the financial results of operations of The Assembly for the year 1965, let me say at the outset that on the basis of actual figures for the first ten months of this year and what I consider very reasonable estimates of income and expenses for the months of November and December, we shall not have to go to the bank and borrow as we have had to do at the end of each of the last four years. At the end of 1961 we had to borrow $16,000; 1962 - $21,000; 1963 - $12,500, and 1964 - $18,100.

The 1965 financial results viewed in light of this background are quite commendable, and our retiring director, Robert E. Bondy, and his executive staff should feel proud of their accomplishments this year.

Before going into detail, I also wish to point out and emphasize that in 1961 The Assembly adopted the financial policy that the basic support should come from its own constituency, namely, the affiliated organizations and the United Funds and Welfare Councils. In other words, it was the objective of this policy that The Assembly's own constituency would provide 90% to 95% of the income to defray expenses of operation. An examination of this objective will be discussed later in this report.

A summary of 1965 financial results projected on the cash receipts and disbursements method of accounting is as follows:

Income - 1965

Income - cash receipts	$ 294,300
Bank loan proceeds	None
Total income - cash receipts	$ 294,300

Expense - 1965

Monies actually paid out	$ 291,000
Less: Dec. 1964 loan repaid with interest thereon	18,500
Actual operating disbursements	$ 272,500
Surplus, estimated 12/31/65	$ 3,300

Operating income exceeds operating expenses, on a cash basis, by $21,800 ($294,300 - $272,500). Out of this excess of income over expense, we were able to repay, in 1965, the December 1964 loan and interest thereon of $18,500 leaving an estimated surplus of about $3,300 at year end.

What were the sources of our 1965 income as compared with the four preceding years?

Total Cash Available by Source and Year 1961 - 1965

	1965	1964	1963	1962	1961
Affiliated Organizations	$ 112,800	108,800	103,300	91,400	95,000

Affiliated organizations United Funds & Community Welfare Councils	77%	79%	76%	77%	78%
Reimbursements	18.8%	9.8%	13.4%	8.7%	8%

There was a marked increase in income from reimbursements in 1965. Of the $55,300, about 90% came from implementation of the Standards of Accounting and Financial Reporting, The International Exchange Program and the comics project. If it had not been for this substantial amount of reimbursement income we would have had to go to the bank again this year.

We are still striving to increase our income from outside sources. The president is again sending letters soliciting contributions from friends and from individuals.

So much for the income analysis; let us look at our cash disbursements.

Disbursements by Object and Year 1961 - 1965

	$ 291,000	274,200	268,400	251,700	241,400
Less Loan repayments	18,500	12,900	21,500	16,400
Operating expenses	$ 272,500	261,300	246,900	235,300	241,400

This report gives you an idea of the scope of the financial operational aspects of The Assembly. These figures relate to what we call the Operating Budget.

In addition, The Assembly in 1965 will expend $749,000 for special projects including the International Exchange Program which is carried in co-operation with the U.S. Department of State; the U. S. Youth Council, and Standards Implementation Project.

In other words, The Assembly this year is doing a total business involving expenditures of over one million dollars. The accounts have been examined every year by the national accounting firm of Haskins & Sells and have been found to be in order.

These expenditures are under the administration and supervision of a small Assembly administration and program staff. May I say on my behalf and, if I may, on yours that they are doing an excellent job under a tight budget situation. They deserve our highest commendation.

FULL AGENCY INFORMATION FOR THE NATIONAL BUDGET AND CONSULTATION COMMITTEE

AGENCY STATEMENT OF NEEDS, PROGRAM AND ORGANIZATION

Human Needs Served

The Assembly is the one national planning and coordinating agency for the social welfare field. Through involvement of national-state-local, public-voluntary, and lay-professional interests, The Assembly gives leadership in bringing about adaptive change in purposes, programs, and structures within the social welfare field, and in encouraging innovation in meeting needs and trends. The Assembly also takes leadership in shaping new relationships with other interests concerned with human well-being, including housing, education, government, business, labor, social sciences, and economic and physical planning.

What the Agency Does

In pursuing these goals The Assembly is committed to the following priorities: Advancing social and economic well-being; achieving new, dynamic, and inclusive approaches to planning; and furthering the realization of equal rights and full access to opportunities and services. Working together on this program are 36 standing committees, conferences, and workshops on which over 1,500 different individuals serve. The Assembly:

a. Studies problems and programs of current and coming import which vitally affect the entire field of social welfare. For example, the place of voluntary social welfare in today's world and how it is to be financed; ways organizations can open full opportunities for Negroes; changing relationships between governmental and voluntary agencies; social welfare needs of the armed services and veterans; selection, training and differential use of staff with and without professional education; automation and leisure; executive responsibility for long range development plans; legal entitlements under welfare laws.

b Influences public social policy of governmental and voluntary organizations through: Analyzing and evaluating programs, needs, and trends; working with key persons in the agencies; adopting official positions developed in consultation with national organizations, state and local planning councils, and social welfare statesmen; preparing and distributing information bulletins and guidelines.

c. Speaks in behalf of voluntary social welfare. Presents point of view of voluntary social welfare for incorporation into the U.S. position on matters before the U.N. Social Commission; prepares report on voluntary services for U.S. report to the U.N.; presents organized young adult interests in national and international affairs through U.S. Youth Council; testifies before committees of Congress in its own name and by request on behalf of local, state, and national agencies and individuals. By agreement with United Community Funds and Councils of America, The Assembly is the national spokesman for social welfare planning, and serves as liaison to state and local welfare councils on national developments.

d. Develops guides for agency programs and policies. For example, how to use volunteers in poverty programs; how to determine fees for service; what to consider in choosing a campsite; personnel matters; salaries; uses of confidential information; what teenagers can do about human rights. With UCFCA cosponsors the National Budget and Consultation Committee. Standards of Accounting and Financial Reporting for Voluntary Health and Welfare Organizations were developed in a joint project with the National Health Council.

Organization

History. Created in 1945 to meet the demand for a central national planning and coordinating agency in the social welfare field.

Governing Bodies. The Assembly, the corporate authority, elects 158 members named by the 79 affiliate and associate organizations and 117 members-at-large, also The Assembly officers and Board of 36 who serve 3-year terms. Chairmen of standing units are ex officio Board members. In 1965, The Assembly met twice; average attendance 200. The Board met 4 times; average attendance 24.

Officers. Board: Chairman, Winslow Carlton; Vice Chairmen: Robert F. Shea, Sanford Solender; Secretary: C.F. McNeil. The Assembly: President, William H. Bulkeley; Vice Presidents: Margaret Hickey, R. Wolcott Hooker, John F. Meloney, Chester McKittrick, Leo Perlis, Mrs. Alexander B. Ripley, Ira A. Schur; Secretary, Mrs. Michael Harris; Treasurer, Eugene J. Patton.

Staff. Total: 45. NSWA: 18 full-time, 2 part-time. (5 full-time, 1 part-time are professional). Special staff: 25.

Community Relations. No local branches. Work through members-at-large, national organizations, united funds, and welfare planning councils.

HIGHLIGHTS OF PROGRAM

The Assembly in 1966 will continue its regular on-going activities; will complete the special Study of Future Role and Program begun in 1965; will work further on implementation of uniform accounting and financial reporting; and will give special attention to four major areas: 1) Anti-poverty programs. 2) Extending and strengthening relationships with departments and agencies of the Federal government. 3) Governmental and voluntary agency relationships, roles and responsibilities. 4) Financing national voluntary organizations. During 1966, adaptations in the structure and work of Assembly units will be made as the special study progresses, if change is indicated.

The paragraphs which follow report selected program highlights.

Future Role and Program

The special Study of the Future Role and Program of the National Social Welfare Assembly, begun in September of 1965, will be completed in 1966.
The study will: 1) Analyze and evaluate national issues and problems affecting the well-being of people; 2) assess the purpose, nature, and extent of The Assembly's role in the light of these problems; 3) project attainable program goals; and 4) convert program goals into recommendations covering organization, management, and financing.

The scope of the study includes: 1) Factual assessment of The Assembly over the past ten years with respect to trends in financing, staffing, workload, participation in program, and program emphases and priorities; 2) identification and broad evaluation of social welfare problems and issues requiring national study, planning, coordination and leadership for solution; 3) assessment of the nature, role, and utility of The Assembly, its present image, the utility of its materials; 4) identification of means by which to further working relationships with the Federal government, and with other national organizations of similar interests; 5) identification of the methods for improving and strengthening working liaison with local and state social welfare planning councils; and 6) identification of means by which working relationships can be extended and strengthened with organizations and groups whose interests touch upon social welfare.

The study plan calls for individual and group conferences with lay and professional leaders in social welfare and related disciplines. Care is being taken to have the views of united fund and community welfare councils as well as those of national voluntary and governmental bodies. A series of five regional conferences assures geographically wide-spread participation.

The study committee of 18 members includes business, education, labor, government, religion, and social welfare interests. Bernard L. Gladieux, Vice President of the management firm of Booz, Allen & Hamilton, is committee chairman; Mrs. H. M. Rozendaal, citizen leader of Schenectady, New York is vice chairman. Greenleigh Associates are consultants to the committee. The study is financed by The Rockefeller Foundation with matching money from individuals, and national organizations affiliated with The Assembly.

Standards of Accounting and Financial Reporting for Voluntary Health and Welfare Organizations

Implementation of the Standards, developed jointly by The Assembly and the National Health Council is proceeding so that agencies may make their first report by these Standards before or during 1968. The program includes work with the national agencies, with united funds and with regulatory bodies. June 30, 1966 has been set as the deadline date for completion of national agency manuals and those of their local units. United Community Funds and Councils of America is developing a new budget manual for use by local united funds and chests. Technical assistance in the implementation program is by Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co.

A handbook, Forms and Instructions Recommended to State and Local Regulatory Bodies for Uniform Financial Reporting by Voluntary Health and Welfare Organizations, has been completed. Its contents were developed in cooperation with voluntary agencies, state and local regulatory bodies and other public officials. This handbook will be distributed in cooperation with the National Association of Attorneys General and the National League of Cities.

These three approaches - with the agencies, united funds, and regulatory bodies - encompass the major facets of reporting. This means that, when completed, a national or a local agency can use one set of reports for all purposes requiring reports of income, expenditures, and assets, and the relationship of these items to program and management costs. The reports will also provide means for financial comparisons among agencies.

War on Poverty

Historically The Assembly is committed to advancing the well-being of all people, a commitment which was reaffirmed on April 10, 1964 with the adoption of an official Position Statement on the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964. In 1966, The Assembly will give particular attention to the war on poverty. The Assembly will: 1) Continue to emphasize the role of social welfare in fighting poverty, and will recognize that both innovative and established programs are essential. 2) Help define appropriate roles for governmental and for voluntary agencies. 3) Gather information about the experience of national agencies and local units. 4) Examine how such experience relates to and affects agencies' on-going purposes and programs. 5) Identify in what places and ways the established agencies may make their best contributions to the poverty fight. 6) Against this background, seek to develop common understanding and agreement with the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity.

Relationships with United Community Funds and Councils of America

The Assembly and the UCFCA work closely together in ways appropriate to advance planning and coordination in social welfare. A statement of agreement, adopted by the two boards in 1964, recognizes The Assembly responsibility for overall planning in the social welfare field, for keeping abreast of Federal and national developments and for dealing directly with welfare planning councils on such developments. UCFCA continues its responsibility for giving leadership, consultation, and service to local funds and councils, and for keeping abreast of local voluntary and governmental planning matters.

With UCFCA, The Assembly co-sponsors the National Budget and Consultation Committee, and two annual regional meetings - the Great Lakes Institute and the Adirondack Workshop.

Governmental and Voluntary Responsibilities

Plans have been drawn for initiating a dialogue to assess the dramatic changes which are taking place in governmental and voluntary responsibilities and relationships in the health and welfare fields, and to consider and define the respective roles of government and voluntary effort in the coming years. This dialogue, jointly undertaken by the National Health Council and The Assembly, is seen as a continuing process, for such matters are not static. Funds are being sought for an initial group to be brought together in 1966.

Social Issues and Policies

Committees of Congress, public bodies, national organizations and local community welfare councils look to The Assembly for advice, consultation, and information on matters of public social policy. The Assembly speaks for itself on those matters for which an official position has been taken. By request The Assembly speaks on public issues for other organizations and individuals. For example, in 1965 The Assembly testified on unemployment insurance before the House Ways and Means Committee on behalf of 23 organizations and 64 executives. Of these, 10 organizations were local funds or councils and 42 individuals were executives of local funds or councils. The Assembly filed separate statements for three national organizations, and for the Record introduced an Assembly study on unemployment insurance.

Individual consultation has been given to national organizations on specific issues, such as, Federal aid for social work education, and implementation of medicare as it affects visiting nurses and united funds. At the request of the D/HEW Task Force on Social Work Education and Manpower, members of The Assembly Committee on Personnel met with the Task Force staff for consultation regarding needed legislation.

Members of Congress and public officials have been warm in their praise for this aspect of The Assembly work.

Legal Rights of Persons Entitled to Public Benefits and Welfare Protections

The question of legal entitlements and protections under welfare programs is a growing interest of The Assembly. In 1959, The Assembly took the lead in examining the issues around a newly passed Louisiana law which disqualified over 22,000 children for Aid to Dependent Children. A number of national agencies, acting under Assembly sponsorship, petitioned the Social Security Commissioner to call a hearing to determine whether or not the Louisiana action was not in fact out of conformity with Federal law. When the hearing was called national organizations singly and jointly filed amicus curiae briefs on behalf of the Louisiana children. As a result of this action Federal regulations were modified, and subsequently incorporated into law, making it impossible to deny assistance to an otherwise eligible child because of the unsuitability of the home, unless other provisions are made for support of the child.

Legal and social welfare interests have been further stimulated by Assembly publications. For example, Poverty and the Law (1963), which discusses the constitutional rights of public assistance recipients, and Check List of Legal and Constitutional Issues affecting the rights of individuals seeking or receiving welfare and related benefits (1965). Elizabeth Wickenden, The Assembly Consultant on Public Social Policy, has spearheaded these efforts which have involved others also. For example, the Yalw Law Journal in June of 1963 published Midnight Welfare Searches and the Social Security Act, and in June 1965 carried Individual Rights and Social Welfare: The Emerging Legal Issues. Both articles were by Charles I. Reich, Esq. The Assembly, through special financing, gave wide distribution to the 1963 article. Miss Wickenden has secured a grant for an exploratory examination of the legal issues through a project now underway at the Hays Center of the New York University Law School.

Continuing attention will be given to this significant area in the coming months.

Social Welfare and Community Mental Health

A seminar on social welfare and community mental health will be held in March of 1966 under the joint sponsorship of The Assembly and the National Health Council and with the aid of a grant from the National Institute of Mental Health. The purpose of the seminar is to bring together national, state and local, voluntary and governmental service and planning agencies to develop ways to gain the objectives of the Community Mental Health Act of 1963. The seminar proceeds on the assumption that it is necessary to replace the walls between systems of service in the states and communities with bridges of understanding and cooperation. It is hoped that answers will be found to problems of financing, fragmentation, and growing demands for a variety of new kinds of services.

This seminar may well provide a pattern for exploration into other important program areas involving a variety of community interests.

Relationships with the United Nations

Voluntary social welfare's point of view on issues to come before the United Nations Social Commission is developed and presented by The Assembly Committee on International Social Welfare. In preparation for the 1965 meeting of the Commission, agenda items were analyzed, comments and recommendations prepared dealing with: 1) family, child, and youth welfare services; 2) relationship between social security and social services; 3) training of social welfare personnel; 4) reappraisal of the United Nations Social Service Programme; 5) the social aspects of housing and urban development; 6) proposals for the programme of work of the U.N. in the social field 1965-1967. These papers, issued as an Assembly publication, have had wide use. Mrs. Edison Dick, then U.S. Representative to the U.N. Social Commission, expressed "warmest appreciation ... for the help and guidance given by the thoughtful position papers of the National Social Welfare Assembly." She added: "It is a great satisfaction to a delegation to have the back stopping of such an interested and informed group."

The U.S. representatives to the UNICEF Board have requested similar help in 1966.

International Development

Social welfare services are constructive and necessary measures to advance, support and sustain the total society is the central message of a Position Statement on Social Welfare in International Development, adopted by The Assembly on March 12, 1965. The principles set forth in this statement will guide The Assembly's future relationships in both governmental and non-governmental international development interests.

International Conferences

United States participation in the Fifth Pan American Congress of Social Service was sponsored by The Assembly Committee on International Social Welfare. There were 19 on the U.S. delegation to the Congress which met in Lima, Peru in November of 1965. The Assembly Committee was responsible for the preparation of the U.S. position paper on the theme: Social Welfare's Role in Mobilization and Administration of Human Resources in Social Development.

The Assembly is joining with other national organizations in plans for the 1966 International Conference of Social Work which meets in Washington, D. C. in September.

International Exchange

Local communities have the privilege of learning first hand about social welfare interests and services in other countries through the International Exchange Program, which is financed by the U.S. Department of State. Under the auspices of this Program, each year several hundred visitors from some 40 to 50 nations study and visit social agencies in the United States. In 1966, some 1,000 individuals will be hosted by IEP with each visitor's program developed by The Assembly's IEP staff. Through The Assembly U.S. Youth Council, friendships across national boundaries are formed which in time will broaden and enrich the lives of young people throughout the world. In 1965, there were small exchange delegations to Cambodia, Latin America and the Caribbean Islands, and from West Germany, Russia, Uganda, Tanganyika, and Vietnam.

Intergroup Relations

A newly constituted Committee on Intergroup Relations will gather information about the programs, problems, and progress of national agencies and will develop recommendations for use by the national agencies and their local constituency.

Financing National Voluntary Agencies

This subject will receive attention in 1966 through an ad hoc committee charged with exploring the 1) problems national voluntary agencies have in securing adequate financial support, 2) current and potential sources of support, and 3) possible solutions. Intimately involved are the changing relationships with government, project money, and fees.

Regional Conferences and Workshops

Regional national organization field staff conferences offer the opportunity for a careful look at problems specific to the region, and for making plans on how best to deal with them. Four regional field staff conferences now meet regularly as part of the program of the Committee on Field Service: Western, Midwestern, Southeastern and Northeastern.

Adirondack Workshop and the Great Lakes Institute, co-sponsored with UCFCA, bring together national, state and local agency executives, both governmental and voluntary, for an exploration of some special problem. In 1966 the topics will be New Federal Legislation-Impact on Local Communities, and The Revolution of Expectations.

National Inter-organizational Relationships in Social Welfare

The Assembly is serving as convener of a group of national agencies meeting to review major changes affecting the social welfare field, and to consider their implications for national functions, programs, organizational structure, etc. within the field. Included are National Association of Social Workers, National Conference on Social Welfare, American Public Welfare Association, Council on Social Work Education.

Individual Staff Members

Individual staff members are called upon from time to time for committee service, for speaking, and for writing assignments. For example, four articles in the 1965 Encyclopedia of Social Work, published by the National Association of Social Workers, were prepared by Assembly staff members: National Organizations in Social Welfare, Robert E. Bondy; Voluntary Organization for Social Welfare, Gordon Manser; Social Action, Elizabeth Wickenden; Financing National Health and Welfare Agencies, Elma Phillipson Cole. The 1965 Yearbook of the U.S. Department of Agriculture included a section on welfare services written by Mrs. Louise N. Mumm.

Miss Wickenden prepared a Chapter on Welfare Services for a book, In Aid of the Unemployed, edited by Joseph M. Becker, S. J., published by The Johns Hopkins Press in 1965. Mrs. Cole prepared a Chapter on Interagency Relations for a 1966 Columbia University book Public Relations in Health and Welfare Management.

Miss Wickenden in 1965 was appointed by the President to membership on the Citizen's Advisory Council on the Status of Women. She was also invited to membership on the National Advisory Committee to the Legal Services Program of the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity. She is a member of the Advisory Council on Public Welfare, charged with reporting in 1966 to Congress and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare on changes needed in the public assistance and child welfare services provisions of the Social Security Act.

Staff members have helped in the development of standards, for example homemaker services, and for accreditation of agencies serving blind persons.

Publications

Publications are an integral part of The Assembly's service to the field. A regular newsletter to the constituency highlights developments. Guides for organizing and operating programs and services are developed with the help of technicians in the related fields. For example, youth work camps, use of case aides, handling confidential case material. Information bulletins are issued analyzing new Federal proposals or laws, or dealing with some critical and emerging problem. For example, taxes, health care for the aged, poverty, youth employment. Occasional papers pertinent to The Assembly's program emphases are issued: integration, poverty. Studies and special directories are prepared: a study of salaries and working conditions in social welfare, titles and definitions of social welfare positions for the Department of Labor Dictionary of Occupational Titles, Service Directory of National Organizations affiliated and associated with The Assembly. In 1965, 20 items were added to The Assembly's Publication List.

Dear Mr. Manser:

Thank you for the invitation to attend your New Orleans meeting on February 15. While I would like very much to be with you, regrettably I have another commitment.

Our Director of Field Activities, Ed Stanfield is available and would be happy to come if you wish. We would not suggest this except that we have a great interest in the Assembly and would like to have SRC represented.

With best wishes.

Dear Mr. Anthony:

Mr. Gladieux has asked me to acknowledge your letter of December 29 concerning the invitation to Mr. Leslie Dunbar to attend the Regional Consultation in New Orleans in connection with the current study of The Assembly. Since the intention of our invitation was to obtain organizational as well as individual representation, we would be very pleased to have you attend the New Orleans meeting in Mr. Dunbar's stead. Is this a possibility for you?

With best wishes for the new year.

Gentlemen:

Mr. Leslie Dunbar has recently become the Executive Director of the Field Foundation, Inc., 250 Park Avenue, New York 17, New York. I am sure he would be interested in your study.

All of our agencies should occasionally undertake what the Assembly is now doing, and we would appreciate it if you could share the results of the study with us.

With best wishes.

Dear Mr. Dunbar:

A major study of the future role and program of the National Social Welfare Assembly is currently underway. The study is being conducted by Greenleigh Associates, Inc. Briefly, the purpose of the study is to:

1. Analyze national issues and problems related to planning and coordination of efforts affecting the conservation and development of human resources;

2. Ascertain the nature of the need for a national planning and coordinating agency; and to

3. Recommend the future function, role, program, organization, management and financing for The Assembly in light of these problems and needs.

One of the most important features of the study is a series of five Regional Consultations of outstanding leaders in various fields concerned with human welfare to consider the problems and issues of developing effective national planning and coordinating efforts. These meetings are by invitation only and will be limited to 30-40 people. Attached is a list of some of the issues that will be on the agenda.

We would like you to participate in the New Orleans Regional Consultation which will be held in New Orleans at the Sheraton-Charles Hotel on Tuesday, February 15, 1966, from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m., including luncheon. Funds available for the conduct of the study will enable us to reimburse you for your necessary travel and other expenses in connection with your attendance at this meeting.

For those persons coming from out of the city, a block of rooms has been reserved at the Sheraton-Charles for your accommodation. Please return the enclosed card directly to the hotel if you wish to make a reservation. As this is a busy time of the year for them, we would suggest you return it as soon as possible.

Will you please let us know at the earliest possible date whether you can accept our invitation to be present? The enclosed card may be sent back to The Assembly for this purpose.

We are sure that you recognize both the importance and the urgency of this problem and we trust you will attend.

Sincerely yours,

STUDY OF NATIONAL SOCIAL WELFARE ASSEMBLY

Major Issues for Consideration in Regional Consultations

This statement outlines a number of major issues for consideration in the Regional Consultations which are being conducted as a major part of the Study of the National Social Welfare Assembly by Greenleigh Associates, Inc. The issues are interrelated and require consideration of The Assembly not only in light of its historical past, but, more significantly, in terms of the future role of this organization during a period of accelerated social and institutional change. Of particular relevance is the expansion of governmental planning and development at all levels--Federal, state and local--and the implications for voluntary planning efforts.

I. Scope

There are many areas of concern which might come within the purview of a national organization interested in the conservation and improvement of human resources. These include, for example: racial discrimination, poverty, ill health, mental illness, crime and delinquency, slums and bad housing, aging, unemployment, inadequate education, automation and leisure time, social disorganization, family breakdown, unwanted children, population explosion, urban decay and economic crises.

Issues include: What is the need for an organization such as The Assembly to encompass these various concerns in its program? Should The Assembly program be inclusive of this broad range of concerns or limited to some specific areas?

II. Functions

There are many functions and activities which might be included in The Assembly's program including, for example: planning, coordination, social action, legislative information, research and data collection, conduct of forums, conduct of special studies, development of public policy positions, mobilization of resources and providing central services and consultation to national agencies and local planning councils, and making representations on international social welfare matters.

Issues include: What functions should The Assembly encompass in its program? What relative emphasis and priority should be placed upon these functions in light of limited resources?

III. Membership and Constituency

The Assembly now has a membership of 269 persons, including 154 individuals nominated by 57 affiliate national voluntary organizations, 14 Federal agencies, and 6 associate groups, plus 115 members at large. There is no formalized association between The Assembly and state and local planning councils, although an informal functional relationship exists.

Issues include: Can The Assembly best carry out its future role as an organization of organizations, a body of citizens representing organizations, an independent entity, a coalition of national organizations and local planning councils, or some other alternative?

IV. Structural and Operating Relationships

The scope, function and constituency of The Assembly will, to a considerable extent, shape its general structure and operations. However, in some areas the functions of several organizations overlap or are closely interrelated. Formal relationships with a wide variety of organizations must be determined and a suitable structure to carry out The Assembly's operations must be shaped.

Issues include: What is the best structure and means by which The Assembly can further its relationships and effectiveness with the Federal establishment, other national organizations having similar interests, and local planning councils?

V. Image

The Assembly refers to itself as the national planning and coordinating agency for the health and welfare field and considers itself to be the spokesman for social welfare in the United States.

Issues include: Is this image of The Assembly shared by its constituent members and others in fields broadly related to human resources development? Should The Assembly attempt to perpetuate its present image or try to develop a new one for the future?

VI. Basis of Financial Support

The ongoing operating budget is presently limited to about $300,000 a year. For support of its program operations The Assembly has been dependent almost entirely upon contributions from national voluntary affiliates and contributed funds from local United Funds. Support for special projects has come from governmental and foundation sources.

Issues include: How can The Assembly program and operations be financed in the future? Should support for the ongoing budget be sought from the Federal government, foundations, or sale of services?

To: Gordon Manser Associate Director

I shall attend the Regional Consultation in connection with the Study of the National Social Welfare Assembly to be held Tuesday, February 15, 1966 at the Sheraton-Charles Hotel, New Orleans, Louisiana.

Dear Mr. Anthony:

It is my pleasure to invite you to serve as a member of the National Social Welfare Assembly's Committee on Intergroup Relations, now being reconstituted and expanded. This invitation is being extended because of the special contribution we believe you can bring to The Assembly's efforts in this area.

You perhaps know of The Assembly's many activities and publications relating to various aspects of intergroup relations. While this whole subject has been of major concern throughout the twenty-two year history of The Assembly, recently the Board of Direcotrs has expressed particular interest in the problems of racial discrimination, and has given this high priority for our planning and programming. In spite of some well publicized gains in recent years, we know that much hard work is yet needed before all Americans attain full and equal opportunity.

We are committed to building the strongest possible committee, with a range of interests, background and residence. We expect to have both experts and informed, concerned laymen.

The initial charge to the Committee will be to draft and present for approval by the Board of Directors an up-to-date position statement for the National Social Welfare Assembly on racial discrimination. Future activities may be to help develop an ongoing program in this subject area for The Assembly; to respond to challenges to the voluntary sector from Federal officials; to develop relevant services to The Assembly's constituency.

The reconstituted Committee will have the excellent Chairmanship of Mrs. Paul McClellan Jones and will meet on Tuesday, May 9, 1967 from 9:30 a.m. to 12 noon in the Hugh R. Jackson Memorial Conference Room of The Assembly, at 345 East 46th Street, New York City. As you may know, national committees tend to have longer meeting hours, but meet less frequently.

I hope you will be able to accept this appointment and to give us the benefit of your thinking and insight. Enclosed you will find a card on which you may indicate your acceptance and intention to attend the May 9 meeting. Additional materials will be sent to Committee members in advance of the meeting.

Very sincerely,

Winslow Carlton

Dear Mr. Anthony:

I want very much to thank you for accepting the invitation to serve with us on The Assembly's Committee on Intergroup Relations. We look forward to the special contribution you will bring to our efforts.

I believe that the initial focus for the Committee was described in Mr. Carlton's letter. If you have particular thoughts that you think would be helpful to the staff as it attempts to gather material for our consideration, I hope you will give us your suggestions. In the meantime, I hope that the present enclosures will be useful to you in providing some background material on The Assembly itself.

You will be receiving additional materials concerning our subject and the content of the meeting, shortly. I look forward very much to working with you in this undertaking.

MEMORANDUM

May 1, 1967

TO: Members of the Committee on Intergroup Relations

SUBJECT: Committee Meeting, May 9, 1967

As Mrs. Jones indicated in her letter to you, we have been seeking to pull together some material which we hope will be relevant to the meeting on May 9. Accordingly, I am enclosing several items for your perusal.

1. Attached is a copy of the letter from Mr. McNeil to the executives of organizations and groups affiliated and associated with The Assembly and a summary of the responses to that letter. An attempt has been made to group these responses in a way that may be helpful.

2. Also enclosed are copies of several "occasional papers" from The Assembly's publications, each of which speaks to various aspects of the problem of racial discrimination.

John F. Larberg
Staff Consultant

Summary of Responses to Assembly letter of December 30, 1966

The letter requesting copies of agency statements on racial discrimination was sent to 74 affiliated and six associated organizations.

The response was interesting from several points of view.

1. The rather simple request by McNeil for information from agencies projected a response from 44 or over one-half of the national organizations related to The Assembly.

2. The statements differed somewhat as to content and subject matter. This was expected to a degree, since some were established with intergroup or race relations as a primary function, while many others were brought into being to deal with problems or functional areas of quite a different order.

3. Nevertheless, the statements received can be conveniently grouped into two broad categories--those with a limited focus and those which attempt a broader view.

4. Twenty-four (24) of the agencies or organizations have submitted statements with a limited focus. These statements tend to speak to the administration of the national agency and deal with the absence or elimination of racial discrimination in their staff, on their board and in the extension of services to clientele. This position is perhaps best typified in the responses by many agencies to the nondiscrimination standard established for Federal governmental participation in fund raising.

   Some of these statements also have a wider applicability and extend to choice of suppliers, contracts for services, rental of facilities, etc.

5. The remaining twenty (20) agencies can be said to have a broader view or range of concern, in that they extend beyond the administrative or operational policies and practices of a national headquarters office.

   Eleven (11) of these include requirements for the practices of local chapters or member agencies of the national organization. It is interesting that both types of national agencies are represented, those where authority and policy determination are centralized and those which are federated structures, with local units being autonomous. In the former, policies adopted nationally are binding on local chapters or units; in the latter, the objective is accomplished through membership, certification or accreditation criteria.

Most of the statements in this group are explicit in stating the positive value of integration; describe aggressive recruiting programs; set forth special services and programs for minority group members among both staff and clientele; describe plans to press for the adoption of civil rights laws by federal, state and local governments; and stress involvement beyond the agency into the wider community.

TO: Executives of Affiliate Organizations and Associated Groups

Considerable interest is being expressed on many sides regarding social welfare agencies and racial discrimination. For many years in the vanguard of leadership and action, recently there have been questions raised in some quarters concerning the role of social agencies and the degree of their leadership in this problem area. In some cases there have been questions raised concerning agencies' own practices with clients and staff.

The Assembly continues its long standing interest in the subject of intergroup relations and will soon reconstitute and enlarge its committee, with a charge now to focus specifically on problems of racial discrimination.

One of the first items of business for this newly formed committee will be to develop an up-to-date statement of policy on the subject of racial discrimination. In preparation for this, may we request that you send us a copy of any statement of position, policy, or practice your agency may have on this subject.

Thank you for your cooperation.

Integration - An Appeal to the American Conscience

John O. Nicklis

I am supposed to tell you how pleased I am to be speaking to you today, and I suppose I can, with "good conscience", say that; but I can also say that I approach my task with more trepidation than pleasure. After having accepted a verbal invitation that came through a business associate and friend, I discovered that my audience was composed of professionals and knowledgeable laymen in the social welfare field, and that my subject would be, "Integration - an appeal to the American conscience".

I don't feel at all worthy to talk on this subject, particularly to a group of people who almost certainly have given longer thought to the problem than I have. On the matter of conscience, however, I do feel adequately qualified because I believe I have as bad a conscience about integration as anyone in this room. Over the past months, through the Birmingham violence, the sit-ins in many cities throughout the South, the school integration problems in Englewood, New Rochelle, and other cities, the picketing of construction sites, the consumer boycotts in Philadelphia, and the many other manifestations of the final loss of patience by the Negroes of our country, I have had a chance to think a little bit about the status of my own conscience, and I am not too happy about it.

The first thing I did was to check the dictionary definition of conscience. It says conscience is a "sense or consciousness of right or wrong. Sense or consciousness of the moral goodness or blameworthiness of one's own conduct, intentions, or character, together with a feeling of obligation to do or be that which is recognized as good, often with a special reference to the feeling of guilt or remorse for ill-doing".

This is an adequate definition, but I began to think how we use the word, and it seemed to me most of us consider conscience as a guilt mechanism. We say, for example, "my conscience bothers me". We seldom say, or think, "my conscience made me feel good". Perhaps this is because we fear the appearance of self-righteousness. But another reason may be found in the fact that a good conscience - one that we can recognize as such, and acknowledge to ourselves - requires us to act after the bad conscience nudges us. And it is precisely here that we most often fail ourselves. Or I have, at any rate.

In the broad matter of integration, and on the specific matter of my own relation with Negroes over the years, I must say that except, for the fact that I have worked for a company which has long tried to do a positive job of finding and employing Negroes, I personally have had what can only be called "an easy conscience".

Certainly, I don't believe I have ever consciously or willfully done anything to further the segregation of the Negroes, or to retard their integration into our society, economically or socially. Nevertheless, I must say that I have done very little positively to eliminate segregation or to advance integration. And this is what challenges the American conscience today.

Millions of men and women of goodwill all over our country have done nothing to retard the Negroes escape from slavery after emancipation, but far more importantly, very few of us have done anything positive and sustained to help them. The conscience of America is awakening - it has been awakening over the last several years - but the awakening has been all too slow, and except for the events of the last year, would still be dormant.

By far the most important of these events occurred November 22 in Dallas. The tragic death of President John F. Kennedy has quickened the conscience of America as nothing else has since Lincoln's assassination ninety-eight years ago. It may be that the Negro problem had no direct relation to this horrible crime. But most thoughtful people have seen a relationship between this mindless murder and the increasing tolerance we have shown for hatred and violence in American life.

I share the almost universal hope that the death of our President and the slaying of the suspected assassin without trial may have a profound effect on our nation.

As Chief Justice Earl Warren, himself a target of hate, said in the rotunda of the Capitol:

> "Surely there is a lesson to be learned from this tragic event. If we really love this country; if we truly love justice and mercy; if we fervently want to make this nation better for those who are to follow us, we can at least abjure the hatred that consumes people, the false accusations that divide us, and the bitterness that begets violence.
> "Is it too much to hope", Warren asked, "that the martyrdom of our beloved President might even soften the hearts of those who would themselves recoil from assassination, but who do not shrink from spreading the venom which kindles thoughts of it in others?"

It does not seem to me it is too much to hope. We Americans have an opportunity - it may be our last opportunity - to establish a sense of values worthy of our heritage, to right the wrongs of the last century, and to erase bigotry and hate. As Walter Lippman wrote last week:

> "The only solace for the Nation's grief can come from a purge of the hatred and venom which lies so close to the surface of our national life."

Now, while the dark horror of that weekend still lies heavy on our hearts, while the knowledge of our passiveness in the face of hate and injustice stirs our collective conscience - now is the time to do the purging. The Negro and his struggle for justice and opportunity, should be the place for us to begin.

Let me talk first about employment, for that is an immediate and critical need, and it is something I and other business leaders have a responsibility to provide.

I can tell you in good conscience that most of the leading corporations of America have awakened to the problem, and are doing something about it. We need to do more, and we must enlist even more business leaders in the effort. But there is a new and encouraging change of attitude in the front offices of American business; there is a recognition of the need to provide more upgrading, training, and promotion for the Negroes.

In my own company, this recognition is taking the form of a renewed dedication to a program started almost twenty years ago. At that time, under the leadership of Walter H. Wheeler, Jr., then President, aided by Joseph J. Morrow, who headed the Personnel Department, we began a positive program to employ Negroes in our Stamford plant and office.

Today 5 per cent of our 2,300 Stamford employees are Negro. We have skilled and semi-skilled Negroes in our plant. We have Negro engineers. We have Negroes in our offices, including two secretaries for executives. And we have two Negroes in our management. But I hasten to add, we are not satisfied with our progress, nor should we be. We have not done as much as we should in employing Negroes in our branch sales and service offices, for example.

The growing national concern over civil rights prompted us to re-examine our program this summer. Mr. Wheeler, now chairman of the board, sent a memorandum to all our management, and later wrote all employees. He recalled our leadership in establishing fair employment practices. "However", he wrote, "I am sure all of us will agree that we have not done a complete job, by any means, and there is much more for us to do. I need not emphasize that this matter is of upmost national importance ... The issue is more challenging than it has been in our history since the Civil War.

"All of us should carefully examine our personal attitudes and practices. We should make every effort to increase our employment of Negroes, as well as other minorities, just as rapidly as we can. We should also be sure that we are giving equal opportunity for training and promotion of Negroes and other minorities after they are hired, and we should co-operate with other industries and organizations in community programs to eliminate racial discrimination and injustices."

Following this directive, we have been reviewing our entire program and have taken a number of positive steps:

1. We have enlisted the help of the Negro community in Stamford, to send us applicants who have the desire and potential to learn the jobs we have available. Last Wednesday, for example we invited a dozen Negro leaders in the community to have lunch with an equal number of Pitney-Bowes officers and personnel officials, to discuss our program. It was an encouraging and enlightening session - for all of us. Among other things, we at Pitney-Bowes have a new understanding of some of the community problems and conditions that make it difficult for Negroes to qualify themselves for the jobs we have. One thing we learned is that our schools must take more responsibility for motivating and guiding Negro youngsters. It would seem to me we need to change radically our concept of schooling for these deprived youngsters in slum area schools. This is something all of us need to work on, and we particularly need the help of social welfare agencies.

2. We have started a policy of preferential hiring. This is admittedly a somewhat radical step. On the surface, it would appear very difficult to convince our management and employees that Negro applicants should be given preference for jobs. But we have explained the essential rightness of such a policy by reminding our people of 200 years of outright slavery, and another 100 years of discrimination. Their reaction has been encouraging, as we knew it would be.

3. We are reviewing our testing procedures to be sure that the tests are not unfair to Negro applicants, in view of the generally poor educational opportunities many of them have had, and because we know they have not had the incentive to study and become educated because of the lack of economic opportunity. We have reached the tentative conclusion that employment tests are not fair to Negro applicants and that something must be substituted that will let us know they have the ambition, initiative, aptitude, and intelligence to become good employees. Perhaps no test can do this, and we shall have to rely on the ability of our recruiters and interviewers to be able to recognize these qualities. This means longer and more skillful interviews, and more careful checking of references.

   One of our problems in this regard, and one which we have made Negro leaders aware of, is that there is a greater risk of failure when applicants are hired without the benefit of experience or tests. There may well be some unhappiness and disillusionment among Negro applicants who are hired and later have to be released if they just can't do the job. This we recognize as a major problem, but we plan to go that extra mile in order to be sure before we release any Negroes we employ.

4. In our manufacturing operations, we normally have employed people who already have the skills we need. But we now plan to meet part of our future need by hiring inexperienced Negroes and giving them special on-the-job training. These new Negro employees, as well as those already working with us, will be eligible for further training to equip them for upgrading and promotion. We will give no preference to them at this stage, of course, because it wouldn't be fair to them or to us to do so. But we will be sure promising Negroes are not overlooked, which is likely to happen unless we carefully and regularly review their performance and progress.

5. In our field organization, which is composed largly of salesmen and service mechanics, we are going to follow a similar program, although in the South our progress is probably going to be somewhat slower than it is elsewhere. However, in all areas of the country where we can do so, we intend to recruit Negro salesmen and Negro servicemen and office workers, using the help of the Urban Leagues. These people will be trained after they are employed. The percentage failures among white salesmen is, of course, quite high, despite our best efforts to screen applicants for those characteristics that tend to lead to failure. So we must be ready for the fact that there probably will be a high failure percentage among Negro salesmen - something we have already learned in New York, where we have employed Negroes for a number of years. For this reason, we believe we must select sales trainees with care if we are not to discourage both Negro applicants and our branch managers. The situation is quite different where servicemen are concerned. We are sure we can get Negro applicants who show reasonable mechanical aptitude, and we know we can train them to service our products.

I would emphasize once again that we are not alone in what we are doing. Nor were we alone when we started during the Forties. Such companies as IBM, General Foods, Bristol-Myers, RCA, International Harvester, and many others have had integration programs as long or longer than we have, and many of them have made as much or more progress.

While employment is important, an increasing number of corporations also are recognizing their responsibility to support Negro organizations. Their leadership is imperative if we are to solve the problem of equal rights. Our company, in the last few years, has increased its support of the National Urban League, the United Negro College Fund, the National Negro Scholarship and Service Fund, and we will be considering other Negro organizations for support.

We are aware that if Negro citizens are to get the equality they should have as Americans, more than employment opportunity is necessary. It is a vicious circle: equal employment requires better education, better housing, and better social welfare services, and most of these things require that the Negro be able to earn more money. They all can be provided, however, if the concerned citizens of good conscience organize and act with purpose. It is here that we must all work together more effectively.

The National Social Welfare Assembly, and the national and local organizations that constitute your membership represent a powerful potential for progress. I'm sure you are already working on the problem. But I would guess that social agencies, as well as industries must seriously re-examine what they have done, and should do now, about helping the Negro to achieve equality. Much of the progress we made in the early part of the century in eliminating social injustices and ills was the result of the strong leadership given by social workers and laymen, working together. I sense we have not had the same concern in recent years, and that we know we haven't and are ready to do something about it. Who knows better the crippling efforts of intolerance, slum housing, overcrowded and understaffed schools, unemployment, and the many other products that accompany second class citizenship, black or white. If social workers, and we who are community leaders and board members do not speak out and join other interested citizens in action programs to combat these problems, who will?

Last Wednesday, President Lyndon Johnson told Congress:

> "No memorial oration or eulogy could more eloquently honor President Kennedy's memory than the earliest possible passage of the civil rights bill for which he fought so long.
> "We have talked long enough in this country about equal rights. We have talked for a hundred years or more. It is time now to write the next chapter, and to write it in the books of law."

Surely we all agree with the President. But we must do more than agree. We must let our Congressmen and Senators know how we feel. And we must get on with the voluntary action that will make integration a fact in our communities.

Civil rights legislation will establish a decent minimum legal basis for Negro citizens. Our task is to act in the social and economic sectors in our communities, in most of which we already have good laws. Our job is to let our consciences speak to us and will the action needed to bring Negroes, at long last, into that full fellowship which our best traditions and religious principles demand.

The time has come when each of us must act from the depths of his own conscience to bring the shame of discrimination and segregation to an end. From the depths of my bad conscience, I pledge to you I intend to do just that.

We have indeed talked long enough, in the nation and in our communities. And so have I here today.

Thank you for your attention and kindness.

The Role of Social Welfare in the Current Integration Struggle

Whitney M. Young, Jr.

I am pleased to meet here as it were, with members of the family. Certainly, members of my professional family, and members of my philosophical family. In such a situation one has to be careful about praising, because one cannot praise without seeming to praise themselves, and this would be immodest. One must be equally careful about condemning. One could not condemn without condemning themselves, and for me this would be unthinkable.

Like most human beings, I prefer to look at the plesant and beautiful and the attractive, and to push into the deep subconscious that which is ugly and sad and unpleasant.

But there comes a time when such flight from reality when such irresponsible kind of behavior is so dangerous, so stupid, so tragic that responsible human beings are left with no choice other than to face honestly themselves, their societies and their communities.

For me this moment has come. I hope for all of you that this moment also is here. I am thinking about the tremendous challenge that we all face today in the question of race relations. A variety of labels has been given: The Year of Decision, The Moment of Truth, The Summer of Discontent, or more popularly, the Negro Revolution. Whatever title you would call it, whatever label you would give, only the most indifferent, the most callous person could have failed to recognize certain messages that have come through loud and clear our of this year's activities.

What is the Situation ?

The first is that the Negro citizen in this country is determined to be free, is determined to have in fact first class citizenship, and is willing to pay whatever cost is involved.

He is fully aware that the cost might well be death, but he has read too well the history books about the American Revolution, and he has read Patrick Henry, and he has now decided that it is better to be dead than to be alive and to be a second class citizen.

He knows full well that while this country has great capacity for decency and for goodness, it also has a proclivity for cruelty. And so he knows that he runs a calculated risk. And we know that this is not a phonomena of a few, but that this is truly a grass roots movement. This is a ferment that stems out of the smallest hamlet and community.

It beats strongly in the breasts of every Negro. It is not a phenomena of 1963 but is a determined persistent activity and desire and will not disappear simply by wishing it so.

This is not a nightmare from which people can awaken and find everything status quo. The Negro must either be given his freedom or he must be completely enslaved. Like other human beings there is no middle ground.

Secondly, it seems to me that it has been made extremely clear that the grievances to which Negro citizens are addressing themselves are very real, that they are not fantasies and they are not dreams of little children. To put it in my vernacular, the Negro citizen is really hurting in this country. With any other group of citizens so situated we would be in the midst of a shooting revolution, not a nice clean social revolution.

Today the Negro citizens have fifteen per cent unemployed within their group as contrasted with six per cent of the white labor force. Some fifty per cent of the one million youngsters between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one who are out of work and out of school are Negro youngsters. The Negro family today earns just about one half what the average white family earns, and in this situation the gap has widened instead of closing.

The Negro youngsters still receive three and a half years less education. When one considers that that education is received in slum, inferior, segregated schools north or south, then the difference is more like five years.

The Negro parents still die seven and a half years sooner. One of six Negro families lives in a home that the census has classified as dilapidated and substandard, one out of six as compared to one out of thirty-two for white citizens. The grievances are very real and very drastic.

In this situation it is small comfort to remind these victims of all that has been done for them in the past, the extent to which they are better than somebody else. The Negro citizen today is concerned about "What have you done for me lately" and "What shall you do for me tomorrow?"

It is also important to point out that this problem is not likely to diminish, and certainly not in our urban areas for one of two obvious reasons. One, the urban population as far as Negroes are concerned will continue to increase. White citizens will continue to flee to the suburbs where they hope they will form a white noose, or at best a speckled noose. The increase of the Negro pouplation into the urban cities due to migration and increased birth rate will continue.

We can expect in the North where most of our social agencies are concentrated in the urban setting, more not less disorder, more demonstrations, a greater manifestation of the determination to be free.

We can expect this for several reasons. The first is that the Negro expects more from the North. This is his last hope. He has stayed in Mississippi or Alabama and Georgia as long as he could and he expects now in New York City or Chicago or Detroit to find a life that is better.

So it is like walking to the end of a gangplank. You get to the end and there is no place to go. You either jump or you turn and fight.

The Negro also will be more frustrated in the North because his enemy is not as obvious. It is much more subtle. In the South he at least saw the signs and he heard the language. In the North he finds no signs, he finds beautiful laws that are enacted to protect him. He finds public officials who speak like Frederick Douglas, and he knows that he is hurting but he doesn't know why. He is equal, and he is impoverished and ill-housed and ill-clothed and ill-fed, and is living in a crowded situation. But he can't find the enemy because the enemy is unrelated to current discrimination. The enemy is more related to the discriminations of the past, and the enemy is automation and urbanization, things, that on the surface, are indifferent to race, and this is much more frustrating.

Finally, in the North the situation will be worse because there is the absence of the built in social control and restraint that is so present in the South in the Negro struggle to be free. In the South the Negro middle class and the Negro mass can make easy common cause, they can establish easy communications. Because whatever the economic condition, the barrier which they are seeking to eliminate affects both affluent and poor alike. So there is less suspicion and more opportunity for the middle class and the affluent and the educated to participate in affairs and to lend his restraint and his moderation and his control.

In the North a common cause is not as easy to make because at least on the surface, and for the most part true, the Negro of some affluence can escape. And so it is much more difficult to establish communication with the masses who wonder why are you involved, what is the angle, what is the gimmick. This means that you have some who try and become quickly discouraged.

For the most part, the Negro in the North is left to the mercy of people who have all kinds of motives, and who have a fertile field to exploit because they are people who are in such terrible shape that they become easy prey for the demagogue who desires, for whatever reason, to exploit them and to promote disorder.

What Can Be Done?

It is for this reason that the National Urban League has decided to come out for what we call a domestic Marshall Plan. Civil rights bills are debated as if they were some radical revolutionary measure when, in reality, they at best insure the Negro citizen what everybody else takes for granted. But this has little of no affect on the problem I am talking about, because in the cities all of these things are already resolved, public accommodations and education and so forth.

The Urban League recognizing this, and recognizing that the gap is getting wider, announced a domestic Marshall Plan which has been given a variety of titles, depending on the people's desire to discredit it or to support it. In Chicago it was called Compensatory Activity, in Cleveland, Affirmative Action, and in Miami, Florida, they say "Do Better," but whatever name you want to give it, whether it is recreation or indemnification or compensatory activity, in fact is very simple.

After three hundred years of deprivation, of denial, of segregation, of discrimination, of humiliation and abuse, after three hundred years of receiving the barest minimum in health and welfare and economics and educational and cultural opportunities, any citizens so situated, are not likely in their lifetime or in the foreseeable future to be able to actually compete and to benefit from the rewards, to assume the responsibilities of the society simply by now declaring a condition of equal opportunity to exist. To me this is a simple concept.

What we are saying is that people who have all their lives been undernourished and haven't received the vitamins and the quality of food cannot be expected at this moment in time, simply by now giving equal amounts of food to compete with other human beings who, all of their lives, have received all of the vitamins and all of the food. For a brief period in time, there has to be some special consideration.

Equal opportunity, if it is to have any meaning at all, must mean opportunity to be equal. We are saying that a man who has been asked to run a mile race with another human being, and who is put to run on sand bare footed when the other man is given track shoes and put on a cinder track, even though at the halfway point you decide that maybe this is a little unfair and you put the Negro in track shoes and on the cinder track, it is not right one second later to say "I don't understand why the Negro isn't able to keep up."

Although we know that preventative medicine is in a sense preferential treatment, we are asking for transfusions for people who are anemic. We are asking really that just people be fair. This is no time to rise to some position of fine impartiality after three hundred years of deprivation.

We are fighting against the scars of generations of deprivation. If people want to be truly honest they will say this isn't really a new concept. We have done this with the Hungarians who were fleeing Krushchev; we have done it with the Cubans who were fleeing Castro; and we can do it with Negroes who are fleeing Wallace and Faubus and Barnett.

After all, they are our citizens, they have given us three hundred years of sweat, blood and tears. They did till the soil and hew the wood and nurse the babies and run the elevators before we got automation. We didn't pay them really. These are credits that are stored up, and unless we say this then the slogan of equal opportunity is meaningless. It is engaging in intellectual verbalization, it is academic noisemaking. It is salving our conscience and maybe appeasing our guilt feelings, but it has no meaning, absolutely no meaning.

In today's economic, highly industrialized society, to say well, I have taken the sign down, I have put my autograph on the President's Plan for Progress, forget the past, everything is all right. Everything is not all right.

We are not asking for equal time, we are not asking for three hundred years of preferential treatment. We are asking for a brief period of special effort to close the gap, a special effort for some things to be done by business men, by religious institutions, by social agencies, by educational institutions.

What About Our Resources?

The time has come when we ought to look seriously at our whole value system, the way we deploy our resources. If medicine did what education and social work have been doing all these years, they would have been singling out their most skilled surgeons to treat the common cold and sending their interns out to do the complicated surgery. This is what we do in education. This is what we do in social work.

The social worker, oft times after getting experience, the knowledge and the education, can't wait to get to private practice, to get to the agency where the caseload is limited and the clients are middle class. And a teacher who gets training and has ability and experience, can't wait to get to the suburbs where she is working with youngsters who come from a home full of encyclopedias and intelligent dialogue in the family and the opportunity to travel. Invariably it is the new teacher, the provisional, probationary, or problem teachers that are sent to teach the kids who have no encyclopedias, who have no intelligent dialogue.

Now, the answer to this is not more money. I am convinced of this. It is not a bonus. It is a question of values, and of how we give our rewards and our prestige and our status. Whom do we give our respect to? Do we give our respect to the people who work in the areas where they are needed most? Where the need is greatest?

For social work the Marshall Plan means not just taking the sign down, and not just saying we want a diversified board or staff, or anybody is welcome. It means reaching out, really reaching out and saying we mean you, we want you and we will put up with your aggressions, your hostilities, your withdrawals because we understand it, because we know in the past you haven't really felt that we wanted you and that we needed you.

It means going out not fifty per cent of the way but seventy-five or maybe even eighty per cent of the way for awhile to say to a group neglected and rejected, that now we really mean it when we say all welcome. It means placing in those agencies which really come in touch with the people who need help our very best personnel.

For a long time we were concerned in the Civil Rights field more with the status symbols than we were with the welfare symbols. We felt it was more important to get rid of certain facilities in the Negro community because we felt, and it was true, that they tended to perpetuate segregation, that they provided an excuse not to serve the Negro in a downtown facility.

Well, we found out that the mass of Negroes cannot care less about going downtown. We found out that we were out working on trying to get the rest room signs eliminated out at the airports when the masses of Negroes couldn't care less. They weren't riding in the planes because they were doing well to ride buses. What they really wanted was good schools. They wanted good facilities where they were. It occurred to us that the only way people are going to somehow break out of the ghetto is to break out with good education and with good health and, most important, with a sense of security and with a confidence in their identity, whoever they were.

The problem is how can we say to health and welfare agencies we want you in those areas today, but we don't want this to be at the expense of integration. We still want downtown open, we want Negroes to be able to go anywhere they want, but we want this to happen while you still pour your facilities, your best personnel into those areas where they are needed.

The best way I know to do this is to actually, deliberately put Negro personnel in the downtown areas. It might be unthinkable but how about a Negro executive of a central office downtown? This would make it very clear that Negroes were welcome even though you had services in the Negro community. What if you were really sure that your boards were integrated throughout the city? I would make an appeal here now for the actual re-examination of the whole matter of deployment of your resources in these areas. But do it honestly and don't name the center the Booker T. Washington Clinic for Children or what have you. This is a center to serve people who are desperately in need of service.

What are the Positives?

We do have in this revolution a number of things in our favor in this country.

The crulest thing you can do to a human being is not to deny him but to make him not even care. The fact that Negro citizens in this country do demonstrate, do fight through the courts and through the legislative halls to right a wrong is a very healthy sign. You see, it means that they have not disappeared, they have not given up hope, that they still feel that in spite of deprivation and the abuses to their dignity, that they are still in this country to resolve these wrongs. This is very healthy.

Too many people see conflict as something that is destructive and negative. They don't see the great potential, the creative possibilities involved in conflict, that conflict in a situation where inequity exists is the most healthy thing in the world.

Social workers are not likely, given the nature of power in this country, to be able to initiate change, even a social revolution. But social work has an opportunity here, where the initiation has already taken place, and the issue has been drawn, to now bring their genius and their talents into play.

The events of the last year have made it impossible to generalize. No longer can we identify an institution or region of the country or race of people as the enemy. There are people who are on our side. We found, thanks to some of the confrontation in the North, that some of the most ingenius bigots are in the North, and not necessarily in the South. We found in the South some of the people with the greatest convictions. This represents a real change for all of us and a real maturity to some extent on our part.

Ten years ago if I had heard that the President of the United States had been assassinated, or even five years ago, and in the next moment had heard the voice of my next President in a rich southern drawl, I would have experienced a sense of panic and fear, and probably would have been looking for the next plane to leave the country. I didn't experience any of this.

This says for me that I can't generalize, that all of the conservative and prejudiced people are not in business. There are some real bigots in the labor movement, too.

As a result of this year, we no longer see a conflict between white and black or management and labor, or religious groups. What we see now is a struggle between decent people who care and cruel and callous people who are indifferent. It is a struggle between good people and evil people, between good people and bad people.

Everybody now has been flushed out, and it has been disappointing in some cases to find which side they were on when they were really confronted with who moves next door, and not just how do I react to election in Mississippi. When really confronted, we found out not just what institution you belong to but what kind of human beings people really are.

We are not concerned about hardening of attitudes in the North. Civil rights leaders knew there would be hardening of attitudes when people were confronted with personal decisions. This doesn't bother us. The significant thing is that nobody today, unless he is a candidate for a mental institution, can ignore this problem. This is a very healthy thing. One must wrestle with it and one must make his decision as to which side he is going to be on.

I said earlier that I think social work has a great opportunity. Social work is still identified as that profession that has a concern for the underdog, for the little man.

Now, if social work fails to address itself in a meaningful and a very visible way to this problem - for social workers more than any one ought to understand what deprivation really means, what abuses to people's dignity, and what humuliation means - if social work fails at this moment, then social work will have missed a great opportunity and will have become simply an insignificant vocation.

Today social work doesn't have to stand alone. There are businesses, enlightened businesses, big business, that have turned the corner. We are not out there alone. We can really address ourselves to this without the feeling that we are being radicals or that we are being considered revolutionists.

We can take a stand, and in taking this stand, let us make it clear once and for all that we won't please everybody. The day is past when we must level our positions and our postures to the lowest denominator. Instead, let us try to shoot for the highest ideals as people. We aren't going to pass any meaningful resolutions or adopt any policy positions that are going to please everyone. But we are going to be on the side of right and decency.

What is the Challenge?

Let me hasten to close. I have said that I thought that social work had a challenge. Let me say that I am optimistic about social work meeting this challenge. I have been greatly encouraged by the reactions of NASW, and their forthright statements.

I am pleased that The Assembly has taken positions. I would like to see much stronger and much more controversial positions, but this is the first step.

I am sure some other social work groups are going to take the right position. I know I am concerned that business men are asking me what can they do to get some of our social agencies to get on board on this problem. This is a new twist, to have business men asking me "How can I get social agencies on the ball?"

Nothing more important today exists than leadership. This is what the country wants, what is is waiting for. This country for the first time has been shocked into the consequences of permitting hate and violence to go unrestricted. We fooled ourselves into thinking that we could permit people to express dissent and disagreement with violence and they would only kill a Medger Evers in Jackson or they would only kill little children in Sunday school in Birmingham, that they would only keep killing the weak. We have found out how wrong it is to permit this climate to exist.

Leadership is what people are looking for, in your agencies, by your presidents, by your executives. Whatever you do as an executive, whatever you do as a board president, the ultimate thing is what you do as a human being and whether you understand that here we are talking about a human problem. We can measure some things in dollars and cents and facts and figures; but there are some things you can't measure.

We are talking about a social and specific nature that has an indeterminable order of magnitude. How do you measure the frustration of the little Negro girl of 1945 who at the age of eight when asked by her teacher what is a punishment for Hitler said, "Paint him black and bring him to the United States," or the boy who told me "Mr. Young, I have tried everywhere to find a job. I am a graduate of Harvard Business School, near the top of my class. All of my classmates have been employed, but I have been turned down when I appear in person. I have been employed over the phone, but turned down every time I appeared in person." He said "If they don't hire me because I'm dirty I can take a bath. If it is because I lack culture I can go to museums and acquire culture. If it is because I don't have enough education, I can go back to school. But if it is because I am black, I am helpless because God made me black."

Now, how do you measure this kind of stunted personality, this kind of embittered soul?

There are enough people right here to change this. It doesn't take many. There isn't a great idea, whether for good or evil that has captured the imagination of billions of people in this world and changed the course of history whether for good or evil that didn't start with less than twelve people, but twelve people who believed.

When people talk to me about how lucky we are that we had a Branch Ricky, and a Jackie Robinson, at that moment in history who was a great ball player and intelligent so that he could take advantage of this opportunity, I remind them that this isn't true at all. We had Negro ball players fifty years ago better than Jackie Robinson. What we didn't have was a Branch Ricky, a man who had the courage of his convictions and who had the courage to stand up and say "No, I am sick and tired of living a lie. This is not an all American game. It is an all American white game. Despite what my colleagues and associates and all others are going to say, I am going to make it an all American game." And he did.

Six months later all of his colleagues were giving him awards and everything else. They were very happy because for the first time they began to win all star games in the National League, and they even won a world series. But the most important thing his son said to me was about a year ago. "My father could have left me anything, money, property, but he left me the greatest thing of all. He left me a name that meant courage and respect and dignity."

This is what I mean. What are you leaving your kids?

The twenty-five young white kids I met with recently who wanted to start an Urban League youth movement had to apologize for their parents. They say "Mr. Young, there is no hope for them, they are not going to do anything, but we --. They are going to fertilize the grass and the country club and the golf scores. They aren't going to really get involved in this," and that is tragic.

The most serious tension in our lives today in the western world is the search for meaning. Not who are we but who could we be. Not what do you think I am but what do you think I could be. Any human being today who has not identified himself with some cause that transcends himself and his family is really not doing much.

I am optimistic in spite of all I have said. I fail to see how we can help but respond as a nation to the kind of patience, the kind of restraint that Negro citizens have shown, the kind of responsible activity on the part of the leadership in spite of the provocations.

We saw this at the March on Washington and it wasn't easy. We saw the aftermath of the bombing of the young kids in Birmingham, and most of us would have thought this enough to set off any people. Certainly it should have been enough to be the breaking point of many of the decent people in this country.

We saw the restraint that was present the day after Medger Evers was slain when his wife said "You mustn't hate, you must love. You mustn't breed violence with violence. You must continue this fight as my husband would have you do, in peaceful non-violence."

And here was an audience incensed, bitter. They too loved Medger Evers, but without anybody announcing it, when she had finished, they stood up and sang "My Country T'is of Thee, Sweet Land of Liberty."

Now, this is what I have seen. I refuse to believe that human beings who are really decent can witness this kind of elementary testimony of faith on the part of people who have suffered so much and still not respond. I just refuse to believe this.

It is based upon this kind of faith that we continue to work in the civil rights movement and continue to believe that we will get more and more allies and that truly, some day in the very near future, we shall overcome.

Thank you.

Dear Paul,

I enjoyed meeting you when I was in Atlanta with Shawn Boles last week. You mentioned that the SRC would be interested in exploring the possibilities of cooperation with the U. S. Youth Council in action projects related to civil rights and poverty. Toward that end, Reed Martin, National Affairs Director of the Youth Council, plans to be in contact with Vern Jordan of your staff in the near future.

Reed spoke with Vern some months ago, and the Youth Council is now interested in several specific projects in connection with voter education and consumer affairs, by developing special educational materials. I am confident that we will be able to develop a broad substantive program of cooperation in the next months.

Reed and I hope to be in Atlanta before the end of the summer. When our plans become more definite, I'll check with you about an appointment to discuss some of our ideas. Best regards.

Sincerely,

Barry Jagoda

Dear John:

It is good to hear from you and I do hope you will get down this way in the not too distant future. I have been talking with several people from the USYC and I hope they have been helpful.

We do publish a quarterly, NEW SOUTH, and are sending you under separate cover a complete set of the magazines as published in this format. Purely because of internal economics we don't have a complimentary mailing list for this. I do hope, however, you will subscribe at $3.00 per year. We will add you to our mailing list to receive all other publications.

I shall certainly make every effort to be present at the next meeting of the Committee. I shall be in New York sometime during mid-September, but the Fall is heavy fund-raising time for us which means I will have to get there rather often.

Best.

Sincerely,

Paul Anthony

Dear Paul:

I hope that before too long I will be able to send you a copy of the minutes of our May meeting of the Committee on Intergroup Relations. I think it was a very good meeting and we were pleased with it as a beginning step. I hope that your trip to Europe was a pleasant one.

Unfortunately, I have not been to Atlanta since April when we had our brief telephone conversation, and it does not seem likely that I will be able to get there in the near future, although I understand representatives of our youth affiliate, the United States Youth Council, have been to see you. I hope your conversations have been useful.

Aside from keeping our contact live by mail, one purpose I have in writing to you now is to inquire about a publication which, I believe, is entitled The New South. I have heard some good things about it and I understood that it was published by the Southern Regional Council. If this is correct, would it be possible to put us on your mailing list? Perhaps you know of other items that should be on our shelves, and I would be happy to have any suggestions that you could make.

The chairman of our Committee, Mrs. Jones, is traveling abroad for the YWCA, but we plan to schedule a meeting for the Committee this fall. I very much hope that it will be on a date that is convenient for you to attend. I look forward to seeing you then.

Best wishes,

John

TO: Members of the Committee on Intergroup Relations

Enclosed you will find a copy of the minutes of the May meeting of the Committee. I am sending these to you at the request of the chairman, Mrs. Paul McClellan Jones.

Those of you who were present at the meeting will remember that we had a rather wide ranging discussion which I hope is reflected in the minutes, since the attempt here was to be not only accurate as to decisions, but fairly inclusive as to the subjects covered, as well.

For those who found it possible to attend our first meeting, we certainly hope that the material included in this write-up will provide a useful background and we look forward to your being with us at the meeting which we hope to hold some time this fall. Notice of that meeting and other material will be sent to you at a later date.

Committee on Intergroup Relations

9:30 - 12:00 noon, May 9, 1967
Hugh R. Jackson Memorial Conference Room

MINUTES

Present: Mrs. Paul McClellan Jones, Chairman; Malcolm Andresen, Duane Beck, Edward Carlin, Jean Fairfax, Harry Mansbach, Esq., Mrs. Laura B. Morris, Mrs. Richard Ottinger, Ramon S. Scruggs, and Mrs. Ann Wolfe.
Staff: C. F. McNeil, Director, and John F. Larberg.

A. Introductions

Mrs. Paul McClellan Jones, Chairman, introduced the members of the Committee and the staff. Mrs. Jones stressed the fact that even though everyone present had various agency, organizational, professional or business ties and identifications, each person had been asked to serve with The Assembly Committee in an individual capacity.

Mrs. Jones described The Assembly's historical concern for problems of racial and intergroup relations, and noted that The Assembly, as presently constituted, has a basic constituency of organizations--72 affiliated national agencies, five national associated groups and 338 local health and welfare planning councils or united community funds. Mrs. Jones further indicated that even though fundamental changes are planned as the result of the study of the future role, program, and function of The Assembly, this organizational constituency would continue to be an important base for future Assembly action.

B. Greetings and Background on The Assembly

In describing the background and history of The Assembly, C. F. McNeil, Director, stated that although the recommendations of the study as approved by the Board and the membership have made clear the shape and outline of the future role of The Assembly, the process of actual restructuring is now under way and the final plan for reorganization is due to be reported in the fall.

Mr. McNeil noted that the expanded purposes and concerns as well as the shift in role, program and function for The Assembly are a logical progression from its past history. Tracing down through various predecessor organizations, beginning as early as 1921 and throughout its history since 1945, The Assembly has consistently sought to provide national planning and leadership for the social welfare field and to help bring about the more effective organization and operation of social services.

The recent study by an outside firm which involved the participation of a wide range of leaders from other fields as well as the present constituency, indicated the need to adapt the organization primarily in three specific areas: a) increased citizen control and participation; b) a broadening of scope and concerns; and c) new emphasis on social policy development. The outline for reorganization includes a shift in corporate base from agencies to individuals. The new structure will have a membership of 300 individuals, who will become the incorporators, and from whom the new Board of Directors will be elected.

Mr. McNeil pointed out that the basic working methods of The Assembly have been the use of committees, consultation, forums, workshops and publications and the results achieved have been through education and persuasion. The Assembly's authority has had to come from unassailable facts and logic. Financial support for The Assembly has been from two basic sources--about $118,000 from national agencies and $125,000 from local United Funds. If the reorganization and expansion projections are to be realized, these funds will have to be expanded some and a major source of new revenue will have to be added.

Formerly a convener and limited to seeking a consensus among various autonomous national agencies, only since 1961 has The Assembly been able to issue in its own name position statements which affiliated organizations and individuals are invited to endorse. This function should probably be continued and enhanced in the new Assembly, particularly as it builds a citizen base.

Concerning the activities and program for the Committee on Intergroup Relations, Mr. McNeil expressed the opinion that not only was the reappointment of the Committee especially timely from the point of view of the urgency of the problems of racial discrimination, but also timely for The Assembly to become more active in this area because of its reorganization. He pointed to the new Assembly's broadened scope and its greater emphasis on social policy development as being particularly relevant and said that he believed that now more than ever there was a need for organizations concerned with human welfare and social development to be effective in this area. Developing an up-to-date position statement for approval and dissemination by the Board of Directors was seen as an important beginning.

Mr. McNeil said that The Assembly would want to be careful not to duplicate or compete with other organizations concerned and committed to change in this area. He said that the task facing the Committee--that of seeking to define the best ongoing role and contribution for The Assembly in helping eliminate racial discrimination--was a difficult one, but one which would contribute heavily to the overall effort to define a new leadership fole for the total Assembly.

Following Mr. McNeil's presentation, there was considerable interest expressed in how the 300 incorporators would be involved in policy determination and in the work of The Assembly. In response to a question about how issues would be brought to the attention of the new 300 members and the new Board, it was pointed out that in addition to formal requests or petitions by other individuals or organizations, the informal avenues would remain--discussions between laymen and staff members of various organizations with their counterparts at The Assembly, open discussion at various forums and meetings, etc.

All committees and other groups called together by The Assembly would continue to be an integral part of the new organization and as such they would operate within the policies agreed upon by the membership and the Board. By design, even in the past, these policies or positions have been broad enough to provide freedom for considerable action by committees. As a case in point, the breadth of concern of the Position Statement on Public Welfare was reviewed. Hopefully, this freedom will be broad enough to allow The Assembly to assert even more leadership in the future.

C. Previous Assembly Activities on this Subject

The chairman, Mrs. Jones, then described some of the efforts and activities of previous committees, and mentioned briefly a number of Assembly publications on intergroup relations which have appeared over the years. She indicated that the continuing concern had been for The Assembly to find a way to exercise consistent leadership in this area, both within and beyond its constituency of autonomous national agencies and local planning councils.

Referring to the letter of appointment sent by Mr. Winslow Carlton to each new Committee member, Mrs. Jones reminded the Committee that it had been urged to draft an up-to-date position statement on racial discrimination for the approval of the Board of Directors. It was readily agreed that the present statement, adopted by the Board of Directors on January 12, 1965, in order to meet the Federal requirements for fund raising among government employees, was negatively stated, narrow in focus and altogether quite inadequate for our needs.

D. Review of Statements from National Affiliates

A summary of statements on racial discrimination received from national agency affiliates was distributed by John Larberg, Staff Consultant. Forty-four or over one-half of the national agencies responded to the request for information by The Assembly, even though no follow-up had been attempted with those agencies that did not respond to the general mailing. Twenty-four of the agencies returned statements which, like the 1965 Assembly statement, could be described as limited in focus and typified by the standard required for Federal governmental participation in fund raising.

The remaining twenty statements contained a wider range of concerns and applicability. These agencies had adopted policies designed to effect their local constituents either as branches or extentions of a centrally administered and controlled organization, as semi-autonomous local units or chapters, or as autonomous agencies related to the national organization through standards for membership or affiliation.

Other significant attributes of these statements were: Their stating racial integration as a positive value to be achieved; setting forth plans for special services, aggressive recruiting program, etc., for members of minority groups; stating an intent to press for additional civil rights legislation at various levels of government; and the stress on the need for the agency to become involved in this issue, reaching beyond its regular constituency into the total community.

E. Discussion.

There was an active and far-ranging discussion by the Committee. Although it was soon agreed that The Assembly should attempt to assert its leadership in helping its constituency and others take action toward the elimination of racial discrimination, and that an up-to-date statement should be presented to the new Board of Directors as one of the first orders of business for the reorganized Assembly, there were many points raised in the discussion and a number of different viewpoints were expressed, among them the following:

1) The reconstituted Committee and the new Assembly must not limit its dealings to its established agency constituency, both national and local. Concerns and efforts to assert influence and bring about change should be extended into many other areas of the broader spectrum of society. This would include leaders of both large and small businesses, organized labor, and a growing segment called middle management or organizational bureaucracy, found in both government and private enterprise.

2) New coalitions are needed which will cut across previous organizational and special interest lines.

3) The development of a position statement must not be seen as the only or even the primary action of this Committee.

4) The staff of The Assembly should be urged to seek to influence the activities and policies of other agencies.

5) A number of other agencies have initiated projects and demonstrations. A much broader exchange of information and a much wider dissemination of success stories might be attempted by The Assembly.

6) One vast avenue for impact could and should be the many influential board members already serving with the local and national agencies affiliated with The Assembly. The new Assembly should seek to influence and enlist these people in its efforts. How these agencies interact with other institutions of the community, e.g. education, would be a case in point.

7) One way to comprehend the enormity of the problem is to see America as a racist society. The viewpoint was expressed that white America has achieved its cultural, educational and economic dominance at the expense of other racial groups.

8) It is more productive to concentrate on techniques, regulations, requirements, etc., which produce a change in behavior, than to set out to first change attitudes. Changes in attitudes will come later but they cannot be waited upon.

9) While there was some disagreement, it was nevertheless generally held that any statement to be proposed by this Committee should be explicitly cast against a background of the current conflicts and tensions that exist between racial groups in America. Positive references to hard efforts and some success could be made as examples of the kind of progress that is desperately needed. However, no effort should be made to diminish the size or the urgency of the problem facing our country.

10) Many agencies and organizations may well be genuinely wishing for someone to provide help and leadership in this area. Especially in the private sector there seems to be a readiness for leadership to be asserted at a national level by a national voluntary instrument that cuts across functional and institutional lines. Other organizations and local communities need to be backed up and supported in their efforts.

11) Movement and change will occur when the private sector--primarily the leadership of the business community--becomes convinced that change is essential to protect its interests and to ensure its survival.

12) The crisis is greatest in urban America, in the core cities of the large metropolitan areas. In spite of the shift in racial composition, these core cities are still largely controlled by a "white power structure". Regardless of the trends in population, the economic, political, social and cultural future of white America will be tied to the future of these cities.

13) The importance and dramatic urgency of the problems resulting from racial discrimination in the United States should be a chief concern of the Committee on Reorganization as it undertakes its task of helping to design and launch the new Assembly.

14) The new position statement for The Assembly should not be narrowly limited to the administrative and operative functions of the national office, nor The Assembly's dealings with its own committees, conferences, and Board of Directors. It must speak to The Assembly's organizational constituency and have relevance to their practices as well. Moreover, it should include reference to overall social goals.

In addition to the wide range of discussion described above, it was unanimously agreed by the Committee that the Chairman should write a letter in its behalf, expressing the depth of the Committee's concern of the problems of racial discrimination and the Committee's conviction that the composition of the governing bodies of the new Assembly, including both the new 300 members and the new Board of Directors, must include representation of Negro leaders as well. This representation should closely approximate the number of Negroes in the total U. S. population, now about ten percent. The letter should be directed to the Chairman of the Board of Directors and to the Committee on Reorganization.

It was then agreed that the staff should work on drafting material for inclusion in an up-to-date statement on racial discrimination, that this work should be done in the months ahead, that selected members of the Committee should review this material, that a version then agreed upon should be mailed to all members of the Committee for reaction, and that a final form should be prepared with the chairman's approval to be submitted to the new Board of Directors. It was also agreed that a full scale meeting should be planned for a date in the fall.

Meeting adjourned at 12:00 noon.

Respectfully submitted,

John F. Larberg

Dear Paul:

I'm really sorry to be so late in answering your generous gift of a number of back issues of New South with this thank you. I am really appreciative of your gesture and doubly embarrassed, for not only am I slow to write but I also have learned that on August 1st, I asked our office to subscribe and only today am I "assured" that you will be receiving our check!! I wonder how long it would take if we were a really big organization!

Anyhow, many thanks again. If you get to New York soon, I hope we can meet for lunch. I also hope we will soon have a date for the next meeting of the Committee.

Best wishes.

Dear Dwane:

I sincerely regret that I am so late in reacting to the position statement of the National Social Welfare Assembly. I regret even more that I will be unable to be with you on November 13th, because I think these deliberations of the ensuing position statement are very important.

The paper is a well written one. In lieu of being present to go into great detail with the group, I would like to share in writing one suggestion that occurs to me. Although it is inferred, I think some further emphasis might be given to the crisis of white misunderstanding. Perhaps under the headings of position statement and implementation a specific commitment might be made; to begin first in the white leadership of our own organizations toward the ends of both creating greater understanding of the plight of minorities and getting action on the part of our leadership structure commensurate with the crisis and the need for speedy action.

This is not unrelated to the other matter we discussed on the telephone several days ago.

Please express to the members of the Committee my sincere regret that I cannot attend, and my eagerness to be of any possible help.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Anthony:

There will be a meeting of the Committee on Intergroup Relations on Monday, November 13 from 10:00 a.m. to 4 p.m., in the Jackson Memorial Conference Room, third floor, 345 East 46th Street, New York City. A sandwich luncheon will be served.

Enclosed is a draft of a Position Statement on Racial Discrimination. This draft is obviously still an internal document and cannot yet be made public. Discussion of this document will be the major item on the agenda for our meeting, and I hope that you will review it carefully. You will be interested that work to date on this statement has included consultation, a series of staff discussions, and a preliminary review by members of the Committee primarily from the New York area. The next step is for consideration by the full Committee membership, so that a final version can be presented to the Board of Directors for approval and adoption.

As you study the proposed statement, you may be interested in the following. The question of specificity has been raised and I hope that we can deal with this issue in more detail in our meeting on November 13. The problem, of course, is the need to write a position statement which is broad enough for use as a charter or platform upon which to build future activity and program, and yet concrete enough to be meaningful and effective.

In this connection, there were additional points raised by members of the subcommittee which we believe the full Committee should consider in its discussion. Among these are: 1) Is it possible and feasible for the Assembly to establish, define, and enforce standards for other agencies and organizations?; 2) Should a position statement include the definition of specific program activities, such as developing a central listing of Negro and other non-white leadership to be identified and recruited to serve on Boards and staffs of various agencies both national, state, and local?; 3) Similarly, should specific research, education, training and other programs or projects be now defined and included in the statement?; 4) Should the new Assembly attempt directly to reach citizens groups and other organizations not defined as a part of its organizational constituencies in the past? And if so, how? What kind of services should and could it offer?

As you can see, there will be many important things for us to consider at our meeting, and their implications for the commitment of the Assembly resources are far-reaching. Your contribution of thoughtful concern and interest has been much appreciated in the past, and we look forward to your participation at our coming meeting.

Very sincerely,

REVISED DRAFT - FOR INTERNAL DISCUSSION ONLY

National Social Welfare Assembly, Inc.

POSITION STATEMENT ON RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

PREAMBLE

This position statement grows out of a conviction that persistent and continued racial inequality constitute one of the major and most pressing social problems of our time. It is also based on positive social goals and values fundamental to our history and our sense of national purpose--social justice, freedom, equality of opportunity, and democratic participation for all. Exclusion or unequal treatment of minority groups has not only produced individual suffering and social injustice, but it has also deprived the nation of incalculable contributions in every aspect--social, cultural, economic.

The National Assembly believes that an expanding economy and a pluralistic but integrated society are realistic goals. These objectives, to be made real, require the full potential of all individuals and groups. Furthermore, in order for the American Dream to be more than empty words, we must, at long last, ensure full participation, self-determination, and recognition for all segments at all levels in our society.

BACKGROUND

The National Assembly for Social Policy and Development (and its predecessor, the National Social Welfare Assembly) has a history of concern and efforts in the area of intergroup relations and interracial understanding. Since its inception in 1945, the growth and development of The Assembly has paralleled some of the most far-reaching developments and changes in the history of mankind. Crippling diseases have been conquered; whole new nations have been born and freedom yearned for for generations has come to millions. Man now manipulates his climate and travels in space; he has invented machines that "think" and he sends ideas around the world with the speed of light. Unbelievable sources of power and destruction have been thrust upon us and we knock at the door of the secret of life itself. This is the age that has defied all ancient conventions and man has come to expect anything.

These basic changes are altering the very style of life of people everywhere. Barriers of many kinds have begun to give way and even in the matter of racial discrimination, great steps have been taken and progress has been made. Unfortunately, this very progress by previously "have-not" groups, seems to have revealed deep-seated hostilities, fears, frustrations, and tensions. Man's human relationships have not kept pace with his technical and scientific advances.

Recent events in cities all across the United States, however, have forced the dual realization that 1) a basic change has occurred in all peoples' expectations, and 2) despite progress, the gap between the non-white and the white populations in this country has actually widened and continues to worsen. This disparity is dramatized by the statistics on employment, housing, education, health, crime and delinquency, mental health, family breakdown, poverty, etc. There is, moreover, a gap in communication and understanding that has produced alienation, distrust and a growing polarization. So great is the lack of communication and understanding, and so wide is the disparity between reality and expectations, that America is confronted with a crisis and a national emergency in its cities. It is clear that a major portion of this crisis stems from the persistence of racial discrimination in our country.

It is in this context and for these reasons that the National Assembly articulates this policy statement at this time. To understate the problem of racial discrimination and to ignore its inter-relatedness with the other problems of our times would be a disservice to our constituency and the nation at large. We, therefore, address our concerns and attentions to The Assembly's own operations, to the practices of our national and local contituencies, and toward the structure and functioning of society itself.

POSITION STATEMENT

The National Assembly for Social Policy and Development is opposed to racial discrimination in all its forms. Racial discrimination stands in opposition to the values of growth, fulfillment, self-determination, and human worth, dignity and respect inherent in our national promise; it corrupts the perpetrator and inflicts immeasurable suffering on the victim. To the extent of its competence and resources, it will work actively to eliminate it, seeking to oppose, counter and discredit the efforts of those who advocate or practice this form of hatred, be it blatant or subtle.

The National Assembly reaffirms the previous position unanimously adopted by the Board of its predecessor, the National Social Welfare Assembly, on January 12, 1965, regarding its practices with its own governing body, staff, and participation in meetings, forums, conferences, workshops, institutes and other activities. It furthermore declares that the full range of its corporate behavior will reflect this commitment. Moreover, any agency that wishes to become an associated organization with the National Assembly for Social Policy and Development will be expected to submit evidence of operating without racial discrimination in regard to its board, staff, and delivery of services.

IMPLEMENTATION

The intent of this policy statement is to establish for the National Assembly a platform for future social action and education, actively advocating and fostering interracial understanding and participation. This advocacy function will receive a substantial commitment of this agency's resources. Moreover, an understanding of the causes and effects of racial discrimination will underlie future Assembly decisions and actions in problem areas wherein discrimination is found to be a factor.

In implementation of this statement, the National Assembly will seek:

1) To ensure that all of its corporate responsibilities and actions reflect the objectives and philosophy of this statement, including its dealings with vendors, suppliers, printers, owners of rental facilities, its investment of funds, etc.

2) To sponsor various special programs and projects aimed at reducing racial polarization and tensions and increasing non-white participation in the affairs of social welfare organizations and the development of social policy.

3) To urge and help develop appropriate social, educational, and legislative measures directed to the objectives of this statement.

4) To advise and importune action consistent with the objectives of this statement on the part of various administrative governmental units.

5) To assist organizational constituents and others engaging in planning and carrying out steps to eliminate racially discriminatory practices where they may exist.

A special committee shall be appointed by the President of the National Assembly which shall aid in these activities and which shall also: 1) advise on and review the ongoing functions and activities of the entire effort against racial discrimination of the National Assembly, and 2) periodically review this statement and advise the Board of Directors as to additional implementative steps designed to ensure further fulfillment of its objectives.

December 15, 1967

To the Members of the Committee on Intergroup Relations

Dear Committee Member:

This is to report to you on the reactions on December 14 by the Board of Directors to my verbal report on progress on the Position Statement on Racial Discrimination.

The Board indicated general approval and support for our work and the direction of the Statement. However, there were certain suggestions made by members of the Board which seemed generally acceptable at this meeting. Since these were in line with comments made by the Committee and seemed intended to strengthen the Statement, we have taken the liberty of incorporating them now in the enclosed draft (marked #12) which is being sent for your further review.

You will be interested to note that it was felt that: 1) we must underline our opposition to all kinds of discrimination, even though we spotlight racial discrimination at this time; 2) it would be useful to enumerate some of the other problems in which race is a primary factor; and 3) since the whole Statement will be received as a recommendation to the Board, which has the ultimate responsibility to accept or reject any part of it, we might appropriately include our position on membership criteria in the body of the Statement, as we had originally wished to do.

To help you in your review and further reactions, note please that this version is directly based on draft #11. Those words or sections to be eliminated from that draft are in parentheses and that which is to be added is underscored.

Finally, would you please again give this your careful attention. If we can receive enough reactions by mail or phone, it may not be necessary to call another meeting before presenting an agreed upon version to the Board of Directors.

Once again, happy holiday!

Very sincerely,

Mrs. Paul McClellan Jones

Enclosure: Draft #12 of Position Statement

REVISED DRAFT #12 - FOR INTERNAL DISCUSSION ONLY

National Social Welfare Assembly, Inc.
345 East 46th Street, New York, N.Y. 10017

POSITION STATEMENT ON RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

STATEMENT OF POSITION AND POLICY

The National Assembly for Social Policy and Development is opposed to (racial) discrimination in all its forms, be it racial, ethnic, class or religious. But out of a sense of crisis and urgency we now address this Statement to the problems of race. Racial discrimination stands in opposition to the values of growth, fulfillment, self-determination, and of human worth, dignity and respect inherent in our national promise; it corrupts the perpetrator and inflects immeasurable suffering on the victim.

The National Assembly will work actively to eliminate racial discrimination wherever it exists. It will seek to influence public policy and private behavior to the end that they are consistent with the ideals of equality of opportunity and full participation by all segments in society. To the extent of its competence and resources it shall oppose, counter and discredit the efforts of those who advocate or practice this form of hatred, be it blatant or subtle. Racial discrimination has had an insidious effect on all phases of our public and private life and has prohibited the attainment of full and equal opportunity and participation by all. Change is needed now to provide: 1) adequate employment opportunities and advancement; 2) effective job training; 3) quality housing in adequate amounts and on an open basis; 4) integrated and first-rate education at all levels and under all auspices; and 5) the full participation as peers by all minority groups in community life.

Furthermore, the National Assembly reaffirms the previous position against discrimination unanimously adopted by the Board of its predecessor, the National Social Welfare Assembly, on January 12, 1965, regarding its practices with its own governing body, staff, and participation in meetings, forums, conferences, workshops, institutes and other activities. (Moreover) It declares that the full range of its corporate behavior will reflect this commitment. Moreover, any agency to become an associated organization with the National Assembly for Social Policy and Development must operate without racial discrimination in regard to its board, staff, and delivery of services.

BACKGROUND

Recent events in cities all across the United States have forced the dual realization that 1) a basic change has occurred in all peoples' expectations, and 2) despite limited progress in selected areas, the gap between great numbers of non-white citizens and the rest of society in this country continues to widen. Furthermore, in spite of significant legislative actions and judicial decisions, full participation by excluded groups is still unrealized. The battleground must shift to the arenas of administrative action, corporate decisions, implementation of human services, and day-to-day behavior of individual citizens--which are less dramatic and escape the public's attention and support. A lack of a sense of movement somehow belies both the daily gains and the enormity of the ground that remains to be covered. There is, moreover, a gap in communication and understanding that has produced alienation, distrust and a growing polarization. So great is the lack of communication and understanding, and so wide is the disparity between reality and expectations, that America is confronted with a monumental crisis and a national emergency in its cities.

Persistent and continued racial inequality constitutes the major and most pressing social problem of our time. Exclusion or unequal treatment of minority groups has not only produced individual suffering and social injustice, but it has also 1) deprived the nation of incalculable contributions in every aspect--social, cultural, economic, and 2) created a false and perverted sense of superiority in the majority group.

The National Assembly believes that an expanding economy and a pluralistic and integrated society are realistic goals. Their attainment requires the fulfillment of the potential of all individuals and groups. Our society can be truly integrated only if those previously excluded are permitted to participate fully as peers on the basis of both self-determination and social responsibility.

To understate the problem of racial discrimination and to ignore its interrelatedness with the other problems of our times would be a disservice to our constituency and to the nation at large. The severity and urgency of this problem require immediate action, rather than due deliberate speed, and may demand massive changes designed to rectify and to compensate for the inaction, mistakes and willful wrongs of the past.

IMPLEMENTATION

The intent of this policy statement is to establish for the National Assembly for Social Policy and Development a platform for continuing social action and education. The National Assembly will work with and through its own leadership and that of its national and local organizational constituents, building a commitment to speedy, progressive action commensurate with an understanding of the crisis. This advocacy and leadership function will receive a substantial commitment of this agency's resources. We address our concerns and attention to the Assembly's own operations, to the practices of our national and local constituencies, and toward the structure and functioning of society itself. This may call for developing recommendations aimed at 1) the redefinition and reorganization of services of all kinds, 2) the reordering of social systems, 3) the elimination of poverty, and 4) the redistribution of power.

In implementation of this statement, the National Assembly will seek:

1) To sponsor various special programs and projects aimed at reducing racial polarization and tensions and at increasing participation by minority groups in the affairs of social welfare organizations and in the development and implementation of social policy.

2) To urge and help develop appropriate social, educational, and legislative measures directed to the objectives of this statement.

3) To advise and importune administrative action consistent with the objectives of this statement on the part of various governmental units.

4) To influence and work with voluntary and governmental units involved in broad policy development consistent with the objectives of this statement, not only in social welfare, but also in such other areas as education, housing and physical planning, poverty, manpower, and police relations with minority groups.

5) To assist present organizational constituents and others engaging in planning and carrying out steps to eliminate racially discriminatory practices where they may exist.

6) To ensure that all the corporate responsibilities and actions of the National Assembly reflect the objectives and philosophy of this statement, including its investments of funds, its dealings with vendors, suppliers, printers, owners of rental facilities, etc., and to urge that a similar commitment is made by other organizations.

A committee shall be appointed by the President of the National Assembly which shall aid in these activities and which shall also: 1) advise on and review the ongoing functions and activities of the entire effort against racial discrimination of the National Assembly, and 2) periodically review this statement and advise the Board of Directors as to additional steps required to ensure further fulfillment of its objectives.

INFORMATION LETTER # 5

TO: Executive and Central Committee of the NSCF; Key Persons of Departments of College and University Work; Boards of Mission; YMCA-YWCA.

FROM: Herluf M. Jensen, General Secretary

Dear Friends:

It has been some time since I contacted you with Information Letter # 4 concerning the lunch counter sit-in demonstrations. It seems wise to me to send you another bulletin with information. I know many of you are perhaps finding it hard to share this with people but I trust you will persevere since it is really about the only way that the National Student Christian Federation has of getting this information out.

Since last Sunday's edition of the New York Times, in which you may note an article describes the NSCF as one of two national organizations which "serve as clearing houses, providing facts and counsel", we have been receiving a steady stream of information by mail and telephone and an overwhelming request for distribution of material that we have been sending. I hope you will continue to help us to get this information into the hands of students, student Christian groups, and others who may be able to use it in their work on the racial frontier of the Christian world mission.

I. TALLAHASSEE, FLORIDA

Today we received an urgent request that the eight students who are sitting in jail in Tallahassee and will be in jail until March 17th be sent letters from Christian students and others around the country, indicating that they have not been forgotten and seeking somehow to help them maintain spiritual morale while in jail.

These eight students were enrolled at Florida A & M and participated in the demonstrations there. Rather than pay a fine of $300., which in some cases was impossible, they chose to serve 60 days in jail. They were convicted on a charge of 'disturbing the peace'. Mail should be addressed to them c/o Leon County Jail, Tallahassee, Florida. Their names are as follows and ages are in parenthesis:

Barbara Broxton	(21)
John Broxton	(20)
Clement Carney	(21)
William Larkins	(23)
Angelina Nance	(19)
Henry Steele	(16)
Patricia Stephens	(20)
Pricilla Stephens	(21)

II. ATLANTA, GEORGIA

From Atlanta we received information that an Atlanta University System Steering Committee has been established, composed of 18 students, 3 from each of the six participating colleges. They have established an Appeal For Human Rights' Defense Fund which is to be used to help pay the fines of the 70 or more students who were arrested there last week, and who are being apparently arbitrarily fined in varying but substantial amounts. If you wish to contribute directly to this Fund, you may do so by writing: Box 202, Atlanta University, Atlanta, Georgia.

We also have indication from them that they would be very interested in white student participation in the Steering Committee.

III. LEGAL AID AND SCHOLARSHIP FUND

The Legal Aid and Scholarship Fund for arrested and/or expelled students which the National Student Christian Federation set up about ten days ago has begun to receive some income. So far, the largest single amount is $55.11 from students in New England. Will You Please Do Everything You Can To Encourage Contributions To This Fund. Particularly, we need to have it made known far and wide on the campus that it exists. We are in the process of establishing a small committee here in New York who will work out the principles for the administration of the Fund, but already it is quite clear that we have appeals coming to us for help, and we need a great deal more support before we can really make any helpful use of the Fund.

IV. PROPOSED STUDENT CONFERENCES

I have been in contact with the U.S. National Student Association. Apparently they are going to receive grants from several sources in order to hold on the weekend of April 8-9 a national conference of student body presidents. I have urged that they might reserve a place for a delegation of student Christian leaders from the NSCF. If they decide to do this, I shall want to be in contact with you immediately concerning how we could get some responsible student Christian leaders to the conference.

The Southern Christian Leadership Conference is also planning to hold a conference of Christian students who have been involved in the leadership of some of these demonstrations. It is tentatively scheduled to be held Easter weekend. I have also indicated informally to Dr. Martin Luther King that probably we would be interested in trying to have some students at the conference from the NSCF.

V. NATIONAL CHAIN STORE ADDRESSES

Several requests have come for information concerning the addresses of the national chain stores to whom letters encouraging an integrated store policy might be sent. These are:

F.W. Woolworth, 233 Broadway, New York, New York
S. H. Kress & Co., 114 Fifth Avenue, New York, New York
S. S. Kresge, 120 East 41st Street, New York, New York
W. T. Grant & Co., 1441 Broadway, New York, New York

VI. OTHER NATIONAL AGENCIES

Requests have also come for information concerning addresses of other national agencies which are distributing information. I list a few of these here:

Southern Regional Council, 63 Auburn Avenue N.E., Atlanta, Ga.
Congress on Racial Equality, 38 Park Row, New York, New York

Fellowship of Reconciliation, Shadowcliff, Upper Nyack, New York
N A A C P, 20 West 40th Street, New York, New York Southern Christian Leadership Conference, 208 Auburn Avenue N.E., Atlanta, Ga.
Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, 522 Atlanta National Building, 50 Whitehall Street S.W., Atlanta 3, Ga.
U.S. National Student Ass'n, 3457 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

VII. STATEMENT OF CONVICTIONS

From a longer statement, signed by various ministers living in Chapel Hill, North Carolina, I extract a quotation adopted by a local group that has been involved in the demonstrations. I include it here because it seems to me to be a useful and self-interpreting statement.

(Extract from a STATEMENT OF CONVICTIONS, Chapel Hill, N.C.)

"We do NOT picket just because we want to eat. We can eat at home or walking down the street.

We do NOT picket just because students in many other cities are picketing.

We do NOT picket to express our anger or resentment at anyone.

We do NOT picket to humilate anyone or put anyone out of business."

"We DO picket to protest the lack of dignity and respect shown us as human beings.

We DO picket to enlist the support of all (whatever their color) in getting the services in business places that will grant us dignity and respect.

We DO picket to help the businessman make changes that will bring us closer to the Christian and democratic practices."

VIII. RESPONSES

Information is continuing to come in concerning response of student Christian groups around the country. Three hundred students and sixteen faculty members at Yale Divinity School were engaged in sign-carrying demonstrations in New Haven on March 23. We understand they are also seeking to effect the integration of private student housing in the New Haven community. The New York Times also reports that three hundred students at Occidental College in California had their supper standing up the other night in protest at the expulsion of Negro students from Alabama State College. Students at Oberlin College have raised over $2,000. for the defense of Jim Lawson.

The March 22nd issue of the Daily Princetonian devoted an entire page to the publication of our LETTER TO CHRISTIAN STUDENTS.

One of the most encouraging aspects of this whole business is that the student Christian movement in place after place seems suddenly to have come passionately alive.

Praise be to God!

IX. TRAVEL PLANS

By the time you receive this I myself will be making a visit to various cities in the South to confer with a number of people concerning the actual situation, and what responsibility the NSCF ought to assume. I expect to visit in Richmond, Va.; Durham, N.C.; Atlanta, Ga.; Montgomery, Ala.; and Nashville, Tenn. When I come back I hope to share with you more information concerning what I have found out.

Enclosed herewith is a copy of a letter that Allan Burry and I drafted and sent to the heads of all the Communions related to the National Council of Churches. You may be interested to know that we are already beginning to receive very grateful response and encouragement from the heads of the Communions.

FLASH FROM NASHVILLE --

Word has just been received that the three week respite from sit-in demonstrations students have been voluntarily observing is just now in the process of being ended. In the meantime, a report from the major's Bi-Racial Committee, which met this morning, is eagerly being awaited. What the relationship between the two events is remains unclear. Some observers, however, expect that students this afternoon will again be arrested in Nashville.

Also received from Nashville is a report that last Sunday approximately 50 Negro students went to 11 White Churches and passed out leaflets asking church go-ers to pray for an end to racial segregation. From the reports received about this, it appears that some of the students were admitted to some of the churches, but that they either did not try to worship with the congregation or if they tried were dissuaded from doing so in most of the congregations. This effort apparently has been organized by the Nashville Christian Leadership Council. A Reverend Mr. Vivian, according to the Tennessean, described the effort as "completely different" from the recent sit-in demonstrations by students opposed to lunch counter segregation. The leaflet that was distributed was described as "a message to Christian conscience". Among other things it said, "the recent developments toward racial understanding must be rooted in a spiritual comprehension of the situation. This can be done in prayer".

We want to call to your attention the concern and actions of the National Student Christian Federation in respect of the lunch counter sit-in demonstrations that are taking place in so many places in our country these days. Since February 2nd, to our knowledge nearly 1000 students have been arrested and either undergone trial or are awaiting trial.

Enclosed you will find four pieces of literature which we have been distributing in fairly substantial quantities. I hope you will have the time to glance over these, and particularly to read the LETTER TO CHRISTIAN STUDENTS.

The sit-in demonstrations have been conducted by both Negro and White students, but primarily Negro. The demonstrators in most cases have observed a rigorous self-discipline in the techniques of non-violent resistance. When, as in most cases, violence has resulted, with rare exception it has not been perpetrated by any of those engaged in the demonstration itself. Again, with rare exceptions, the police have chosen to ignore those actually guilty of perpetrating the violence and have chosen to arrest the non-violent demonstrators.

The arrest of so substantial a number of students; the continuance of demonstrations of protest of particular segregationist laws and customs, which demonstrations no one expects to abate before the end of the academic year; the fact that many of the demonstrators are acting from deep and sincere Christian motives-- these facts, when taken all together, pose a major responsibility not only for the National Student Christian Federation and its constituent student movements and church agencies, but in our estimation, also a major responsibility for all of the Christian Churches.

In behalf of the National Student Christian Federation may we urge you to call to the attention of the churches in our country the action of students in the cause of improving conditions of social justice and racial equality. This movement is very much being led by students with the deepest of Christian motives, and we are told that one of the most powerful factors in the whole country was the conference that we held at Athens, Ohio this past Christmas on the Christian World Mission. In this Conference, you will recall, nearly 4000 students participated, of whom nearly half were non-White students. One of the major themes of the conference was the racial frontier of the Church. Several thousand more students were involved prior to the conference in Study and Involvement groups using a book entitled Outside The Camp, written for us by Charles West. These Study and Involvement groups were composed interdemoninationally, internationally, and interracially. For some situations in the country, this meant that they had to be organized intercollegiately.

Our reason for drawing this to your attention is: (1) to remind you that as Christian students we are inevitably involved, and (2) that many of the students involved in the demonstrations while professing to be Christian consider themselves to be outside the camp of either the church or society. With reference to the church, we again and again are receiving evidence that there is a growing impatience about the continued segregation of the churches, and a growing feeling that the churches are not taking seriously the demand for social justice and racial equality.

In behalf of the National Student Christian Federation may we express to you the pledge that thousands of students have in effect taken to work toward the desegregation of the churches and to accept this as one of the primary and specific responsibilities in the racial frontier of the Christian World Mission.

May we also call your attention to our action in establishing a Legal Aid and Scholarship Fund to be used in behalf of the students arrested and/or expelled from colleges and universities in the United States.

Finally, we ask you to call these matters to the attention of the churches. We need the prayers of the churches -we need positive action by the congregations which expresses concretely that the churches are opposed to continued segregation, -and we need financial aid for arrested and expelled students.

Sincerely yours,

Allan J. Burry

Mr. Paul Rilling
Southern Regional Council
63 Auburn Avenue N.E.
Atlanta, Georgia

Dear Mr. Rilling:

The National Student Christian Federation has been very much interested and concerned with the students who have been or are being arrested and/or expelled because of their participation in the current student non-violent movement. Some time ago we established a Legal Aid and Scholarship Fund, to be administered by the Officers of the NSCF in conjunction with a special Advisory Committee.

The enclosed document has been prepared with the advice of this special Committee, and has been approved by the Executive Committee of NSCF for circulation to trusted key persons.

You are one of these trusted key persons whom we are asking to work with us as closely as possible in rendering actual practical, and if possibe immediate, assistance to such students. Would you therefore please read the enclosed document carefully, and if you are willing, drop me a little note giving me information where you can be reached by telephone. I would appreciate both your office and home phone number, and will treat it confidentially. While we do not expect that any great burden will be put upon you if you accept to do this, it should be understood that what in fact may happen no one really knows. We, of course, expect to reimburse you for any expenses which you may incur in connection with this responsibility.

Due to the nature of this document, we are giving it only a restricted circulation. It should not be re-duplicated without our permission, nor should it be shown to persons who have no real business seeing it. Here, however, we must trust your own judgement about these matters.

I sincerely hope that we can count on you to help us in the event that that becomes necessary.

With best wishes to you.

Sincerely yours,

Herluf M. Jensen

SUBJECT: LEGAL DEFENSE, EMERGENCY AID, AND SCHOLARSHIP ASSISTANCE TO ARRESTED AND/OR EXPELLED STUDENTS

TO: Selected Persons Working in Relation to NSCF

FROM: Herluf M. Jensen, General Secretary

I. LEGAL AID AND SCHOLARSHIP FUND OF NSCF

Early in March the National Student Christian Federation established a special Legal Aid and Scholarship Fund for the purpose of assisting college and university students who because of their participation in the student non-violent movement were arrested and/or expelled from their academic institutions.

This Legal Aid and Scholarship Fund now amounts to a few thousand dollars, and is daily receiving contributions. In addition there are certain other funds available for emergency aid purposes to students which we can use. We are hoping and expecting that more funds will be received as collections are taken by student Christian groups on campus.

This Fund is to be operated by the Officers of NSCF acting in accordance with advice and guidance of a special advisory committee appointed for this purpose. This paper is being circulated to you to guide you in the event that students turn to you for information and advice.

II. BAIL

When students are arrested they are almost immediately confronted with the problem of posting bail bond, although some prefer staying in jail rather than getting released on bail. According to present experience bail bond can usually be procured from local sources. In most cases certain agencies such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People are prepared to post bail bond for students. We suggest that you may wish to determine who local officers of such organizations are, and how they may be reached quickly in an emergency.

In the event that local resources prove to be non-existent or inadequate for this purpose you may want to contact our office, and we may be able to help you.

III. LEGAL COUNSEL

According to what we have heard, in most communities voluntary legal counsel is available to arrested students. The NAACP has indicated its willingness to give legal counsel to arrested students. In some states, however, the NAACP is in effect outlawed. Another agency interested in legal counsel is the American Civil Liberties Union.

Again, if difficulties are incurred contact with us, or national or state headquarters of these bodies may be helpful to you.

In the event that financial help is required to retain legal counsel, the NSCF will entertain requests for such assistance. When requesting help from NSCF, information concerning the situation will be required, including the names of persons to be aided, the legal counsel being retained, the circumstances and charges leading to the arrest, what other agencies or the local community is prepared to do, to where or whom funds should be directed, and who will be responsible for such funds and there use. When time permits we will seek to send one of our designated representatives to check with you the situation and advise us what to do, but some kind of help will be made immediately available if possible.

Probably the more difficult problems will come when sentences are appealed to higher courts, where more specialized legal counsel may be required. Consequently, we wish to be somewhat "tight fisted" since it may not at that time be quite so easy to raise funds.

IV. PENALTIES AND FINES

If eventually penalties or fines are imposed, and if the convicted elect to pay rather than serving a prison term or appealing the decision, we would hope to be somewhat helpful. Again we would depend upon accurate and detailed information being received.

V. EMERGENCY AID AND RELIEF

In some situations when students have been expelled they have found themselves cut off from adequate food and lodging, in need of medical aid, in need of transportatiin home, and in danger of arrest on vagrancy charges. In some cases apparently they have also become objects of physical violence and various kinds of harassment.

In such cases, and if it seems advisable, the NSCF would help in sustaining them, in procuring medical aid, and when in danger of arrest getting them transported to safe areas, and perhaps be hostelled in student Christian centers.

VI. SCHOLARSHIP ASSISTANCE

The NSCF is concerned about students who are expelled, who for disciplinary reasons related to their activities in the student non-violent movement have scholarships withdrawn, or who may feel compelled to withdraw from their academic institution.

We are concerned that they should be given an opportunity to continue their education, and are hoping to be able to offer some assistance. Some northern schools are making scholarships available, and some funds have been received by the NSCF and alao other agencies. In order to be most helpful we will work in close relation to the National Service and Scholarship Fund for Negro Students and with World University Service in certain situations.

We will be interested in the names and addresses of both white and Negro students who may be in such difficulties. We shall also be interested in colleges and universities who may offer scholarships, or be otherwise helpful. We would welcome information from colleges and universities concerning availability of scholarships.

VII. SCHOLARSHIPS FOR SUMMER CONFERENCES

The NSCF has been given some funds to be used to help Negro students who have been involved in the student non-violent movement to attend and participate in the more than twenty student conferences being held this summer under the auspices of NSCF and/or its member movements and agencies. If you know of such students (names and addresses) we will be appreciative if you could help us establish contact with them. The Rev. Robert Abrams has been assigned to us by the Commission on Ecumenical Mission and Relations of the United Presbyterian Cjurch in the USA particularly to help organize this program.

VIII. SCHOLARSHIPS FOR ECUMENICAL WORK CAMPS AND VOLUNTARY SERVICE PROJECTS

Some of the Negro students involved in the non-violent movement might be interested in participating in an ecumenical work camp or in one of the denominatiinal work camps. The NSCF has a small Minority Students Scholarship Fund, and we know of other funds that can be tapped for helping interested and qualified Negro students. Again we need information and recommendations concerning such students.

IX. IN EMERGENCY

In an emergency you may wish to contact the NSCF or myself by telephone. Our office number is: RIverside 9-2200, Extension 2366. My home number is New Brunswick, New Jersey, CHarter 6,2135. If I am at neither place, my secretary or my wife will know how I can be reached. Other persons who can be contacted in emergency are: Dr. J. Oscar Lee, Natl. Council of Churches, Dept. of Racial & Cultural Relations (NYC: Riverside 9-2200, Ext. 2387; home GL 2-0797), The Rev. Will Campbell, NCCC, Dept. of Racial & Cultural Relations, Nashville, Tennessee(office: Alpine 5-3842, home TUCKERS 3-1901); The Rev. Jack Marion and the Rev. Metz Rollins, United Presbyterian Church, Dept. of Social Actiin in Nashville (ALpine 6-6232).

Dear Herluf:

I very much appreciate receiving your recent memorandum on legal defense emergency aid and scholarship assistance. It seems to be a very excellent document which will be of considerable assistance to all of us who are working with this problem.

I will of course be happy to work with you whenever possible in "rendering actual practical, and if possible, immediate assistance to such students." My office telephone number is JAckson 2-8764, my home telephone, POplar 1-1406.

I will be away from my desk from May 20 until approximately June 27. I am sailing to Europe on an assignment with the Council on Student Travel. If you need help from this office or in this area during this period, I hope you will feel free to contact Paul Anthony, office telephone as above, home telephone, POplar 7-7668.

INFORMATION LETTER # 7

June 1, 1960

TO: Executive and Central Committee of NSCF; Key Persons of Departments of College and University Work; Boards of Mission; YMCA/YWCA.

FROM: Herluf M. Jensen, General Secretary

Dear Friends:

On Monday afternoon, May 30, Dr. J. Robert Nelson, a member of our Central and Executive Committee and Dean of the Vanderbilt University Divinity School, submitted his resignation to Chancellor Harvie Branscomb of Vanderbilt University. A few hours later, nine members of the faculty of the Divinity School likewise submitted their resignations.

The resignations came as a further development in the efforts on the part of the Divinity School faculty to have the Reverend James Lawson re-admitted to Vanderbilt Divinity School. You will recall that Jim Lawson was expelled from Vanderbilt on March 3 by the Executive Committee of the Board of Trust of Vanderbilt. On March 15, Chancellor Branscomb indicated that Jim could re-apply in the normal fashion. On May 26, the Admissions Committee of the Divinity School, having reviewed an application for admission of Jim's to the summer school, recommended that he be re-admitted. Jim was in his final semester of a B.D. Degree program at the time of his dismissal, and presumably could have finished degree requirements by attendance at a summer term.

When the Admissions Committee made its recommendations they requested Chancellor Branscomb to act upon it by the morning of May 28. This he refused to do.

On Sunday, May 29, graduation excercises were held and on Monday, May 30, Chancellor Branscomb met with the Admissions Committee and gave a negative answer to the request for re-admission. It was upon receipt of this negative answer that Dr. Nelson and the members of the faculty took their action, of resigning from the Divinity School.

In Dr. Nelson's letter of resignation, which is attached to this Information Letter, he made his resignation effective as of August 31, 1960. In the subsequent action of the nine members of the Divinity School faculty, their resignations are to be effective not later than the end of the next academic year. In explaining this provision, faculty members have indicated that they had regard for the difficulty which sudden departure would pose for graduate students in the Divinity School.

The nine members of the faculty are the following:

James D. Sellers, Assistant Dean and Assistant Professor of Theology;
James D. Glasse, Associate Professor of Practical Theology;
Lou H. Silberman, Hillel Professor of Jewish Literature and Thought;
Gordon D. Kaufman, Associate Professor of Theology;
Bard Thompson, Professor of Church History;
Langdon B. Gilkey, Professor of Theology;

Leander Keck, Assistant Professor of Theology;
Roland E. Sleeth, Professor of Preaching;
Arthur L. Foster, Assistant Professor of Pastoral Theology.

Of the remaining members of the faculty, two professors had resigned earlier in the year, namely, Everett Tilson and Paul Sanders; two are paid by agencies other than Vanderbilt and will have to follow some other procedure for resignation; and one, Dr. Kendrick Grobal, is on leave in Germany. Two faculty members have decided not to resign, J. Philip Hyatt, Professor of Old Testament and George N. Mayhew, Professor of History of Religions.

Yesterday afternoon, May 31, fourteen students withdrew from the University, including the remaining three Negro students and also including among them several of the top graduate students of the Divinity School. Also, yesterday afternoon, three students who had gone through graduation excercises on Sunday in the expectation that Lawson would be re-admitted returned as 'unwanted under the circumstances' their diplomas to the University. These three students are: Richard F. Dickenson - G. Richard Dulin - Wilson T. Boots.

This Information Letter is being dictated by telephone from Nashville, where I went as quickly as I could after learning of the situation Monday afternoon. Yesterday I spent my time interviewing most of the students who have decided to withdraw and trying to be helpful to them in relocating in other theological seminaries in our country. The letter of resignation of Dr. Nelson is attached herewith as an appendix. As further developments take place I may try to communicate to you what these are. For the moment, I merely want you to know that I am doing everything in my power to express the concern and interest of the National Student Christian Federation for the educational and spiritual welfare of the students who have taken the actions indicated above - and all of them, as you may know, have been involved in the student non-violent movement.

-Dictated, Nashville

C O P Y . . of Dr. J. Robert Nelson's Letter of Resignation to Vanderbilt University:

Chencellor Harvie Branscomb
Vanderbilt University
Nashville, Tennessee

Dear Chancellor Branscomb:

I hereby submit my resignation as Dean of the Divinity School and Professor of Theology, effective August 31, 1960.

The reason for my decision is your flat refusal to grant the faculty of the Divinity School the privilege of admitting Mr. James Lawson, Jr., for further study to earn his degree. You have thus forbidden the Dean and faculty to admit a student who is well known and endorsed by them, by condemnation by yourself and members of the Board of Trust who have not even met him.

In accord with your own statement of March 15, saying he could apply in the normal manner, Mr. Lawson has applied for admission. His application papers satisfied the members of our Admissions Committee that there was no reason whatsoever for not admitting him to the school. Only your own approval was required. I asked for this. You would not give it.

The destructive effect of your decision upon the confidence and morale of the Divinity faculty and others in the University is clearly evident. Equally damaging is the effect upon numerous students.

The future of the Divinity School is now gravely imperilled. No one can predict how long it will take for the damage to be repaired. In spite of all the excellent things you have done to build up the school in recent years, the responsibility for this critical situation is your own. Only you, sir, could have restored the sense of integrity to this school by making a right of what had been wrong. What was the wrong needing to be rectified?

It was the feable acquiescence by University authorities to a public image of Mr. Lawson which was both distorted and defamatory.

It was a disciplinary measure of grave proportion applied to a man of widely recognized moral character because of an accusation which he has never yet admitted, namely, that he was committed to a "planned campaign of civil disobedience."

It was a clear repudiation of the freedom of expression and action of a mature person, acting upon the motivation of Christian moral conviction.

It was a pre-judging and legally guilty of a man who, so far as the public law is concerned, is still recognized as innocent.

It was tacitly a condemnation of the non-violent demonstrations which have since been vindicated in Nashville by the peaceable achievement of our immediate purpose, namely, the non-discriminatory service of all persons at lunch counters.

It was a decision reached under conditions of steam and emotion, following a disciplinary procedure which was by your own admission without any precedent in the University's history, and which has publicly been shown by the deliberations of the University Senate to have been grossly improper.

Lastly, it was a wrong action which brought much shameful criticism on the University from numerous respected persons and groups in the national realm of higher education and religion, and which caused within the ranks of Vanderbilt faculty and student body a deep and persistent sense of outrage.

All aspects of this grievous wrong could have been rectified calmly and effectively by your approval of the decision of the Admissions Committee of the Divinity School.

Since you chose not to grant this approval, I find it inappropriate to continue as Dean and Professor in the school for which I have had much loyalty and affection.

Sincerely yours,

S/ J. Robert Nelson

Wiley has asked me to reply to your question regarding the results of the Nashville project.

I understand from Rosetta Gardner of YWCA, that the results of the survey were placed in the hands of the Davidson County Independent Political Council to be used as the council sees fit.

Rosetta also informs me that approximately 200 persons were registered. Obviously, registration was not the primary objective of this project.

SURVEY OF POLITICAL PARTICIPATION AND AWARENESS

by

The Voter Education and Registration Project

Sponsored by the National Student Christian Federation and the National Student YWCA of the Southern Region

SPONSORSHIP, PURPOSE AND PARTICIPANTS

The Voter Education-Registration Project for the summer of '63 in Nashville, Tennessee, from June 23 to August 17, was co-sponsored by the National Student Christian Federation and the National Student YWCA of the Southern Region.

The purpose of the project was to work toward voter registration and education in the defined political area known as Councilmanic District 21, with the main objective to stimulate and encourage qualified Negro voters to register. Additional purposes were:

(1) to give assistance in developing citizenship education and organization within the given area;

(2) to gather data and opinions on lower socio-economic Negroes' political interests for more effective voter education and registration efforts and achievement, and

(3) to reveal and communicate a concern by our presence as participants.

The project aimed to survey the councilmanic district mostly to find non-registered citizens, to find out:

(1) what various issues interest and arouse the people;

(2) their immediate interests and concerns whether directly or indirectly, and

(3) the extensiveness of political apathy and reasons for its existence.

The participants in the project included students from the North, South and West, which covered a geographic area of 13 states. The group composition was 5 males and 8 females, of whom 3 were Negro students (2 females and 1 male) and the remainder being white students (4 males and 6 females). These participants, being from varied religious backgrounds and cultural distinctions, were elected by a joint committee representing both organizations. They were:

The Leaders - MR. AND MRS. WILSON YATES, Mr. Yates a native of Missouri and Mrs. Yates a native of Mississippi, presently residing in Nashville. They will return to Boston in early September.

Assistant Leader - DAVID DANSBY, Greensboro, North Carolina and second year law student at the University of North Carolina.

RALEIGH BAILEY - Miami, Florida; Junior at Florida Southern College in Lakeland, Florida.

MERRIE-LOU DOUGLAS - Manhattan, Kansas; Junior at Washington State University.

MARY SUE GELLATLY - Portland, Oregon; Senior at Willamette College, Salem, Oregon.

DAN MARSTON - Eau Claire, Wisconsin; Junior at Wisconsin State College, Eau Claire, Wisconsin.

MARY M. MILLS - Spartanburg, South Carolina; Junior at Delaware State College, Dover, Delaware.

ROBERTA MOSELY - Bronx, New York; '63 graduate of Pembroke College, Providence, Rhode Island.

ROSEMARY SMITH - East Orange, New Jersey; Senior at Albion College, Albion, Michigan.

CAROL TUCKER - Ligonier, Pennsylvania; Senior at Pennsylvania State University.

IRENE WYLIE - Boston, Massachusetts; Junior at Pembroke College, Providence, Rhode Island.

DEAN ZIMMERMANN - Carrington, North Dakota; Junior at Valley City State Teachers' College, Valley City, North Dakota.

Each had had direct or indirect experience in the civil rights movement and shared the same concern which is "the struggle for the betterment of society." During the project the participants analyzed their activities and survey work, shared reactions and reflections upon the entire experience.

Although we were from various states and with different religious beliefs we were participants to aid equality.

COMMUNITY LIFE

The Voter Education-Registration project officially began on June 23, 1963, and ran through August 17, 1963. The housing for the group was located in a white residential area and was selected basically on availability. Two adjacent buildings were used for sleeping with one of the buildings also serving as general meeting and eating place.

The first three days were devoted to orientation, determining schedules and procedures, meeting with civic leaders, and general planning of community life. On the fourth day the group went into a rough schedule which was generally followed throughout the project up until the last few days which were used for evaluation.

During the orientation the participants studied such literature as Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s "Letter from Birmingham Jail" and various types of sociological and civil rights data as provided through such means as the Southern Regional Council.

On a typical week day the group would rise at 7:30 and eat at 8:00. Then would follow worship, chores, and/or seminar. At 12:30 the group would eat lunch and then prepare for actual district work which would begin around 3:00 and take the rest of the day and evening, with the exception of 5:30 to 7:00 which was used for a picnic supper at a public park in the area.

Worship each morning was presented by different members of the group who organized and led the services. This provided a wide variety of worship experiences due to a diverse religious background of the group. On Sunday mornings the group generally visited different churches within the voting district.

All domestic duties were performed by the project participants themselves on a two-man team rotation basis daily with a couple of mornings a week devoted specifically to chores.

The seminars and study groups were a significant part of the project. They were generally held in the morning for a period of one to two hours but were occasionally held in the evening for the convenience of outside speakers. There were two basic types of seminars. The first type was devoted to themes of race relations and Nashville political, economic and social structures. These were led by civil rights leaders, sociologists, and politicians. The second type of seminar ran along the lines of Bible study and Christian ethics and how these related to the purpose and goals of the project. These study groups were usually led by Vanderbilt Divinity School students and professors.

The group had free time Saturday afternoons and evenings, Sundays, and some Wednesday afternoons. Most of this time was used in informal activities such as movies, swimming and campus visiting. There were also group planned activities such as visiting Cheekwood Estate and Montgomery Bell State Park. A number of activities were shared with an interracial student group working in the city for the summer under the auspices of the American Friends Service Committee. Some people of the white community who were known through church activities had the group to their homes for visiting and for dinner. There was a good deal of communication with persons of student age in the Negro district, and quite a bit of informal recreation was experienced in this area.

Another significant aspect of the project was a field trip the group made to Atlanta. This three day trip was spent in discussions with various civil rights leaders.

FIELD WORK

Description of the District

In the recent change to metropolitan government the city of Nashville was merged politically with Davidson County. The new area has been redivided into 35 political districts, each having a population of approximately 10- to 12,000, and each represented by a metropolitan councilman. In addition there are 5 councilmen at large.

Our project was concerned with only one of these districts, number 21. The councilmanic seat for District 21 was until the recent election controlled by a single political machine headed by a Negro woman. With the election of November, 1962, this control was broken by Mr. John Driver, who is now the councilman for the district.

District 21 is located in the northwest section of Nashville, and is roughly bounded on the south by Charlotte Avenue, on the north by Centennial Boulevard, on the west by 42nd Avenue North and on the east by 24th and 27th Avenues North.

The area has a high Negro concentration (96.7%). There is no uniform socio-economic character to the community, although it might be said that upper lower-class families predominate. Residential patterns within the district reflect this variety to the extent that extremes of income tend to be found in different portions of the district. On the other hand, in several of the blocks it is not uncommon to see both very nice homes and considerably less attractive dwellings.

Physically District 21 contains three elementary schools, one major park and one small shopping center. Small businesses are scattered throughout the area. The northern edge of the district is the location of Tennessee State Agricultural and Industrial University.

There are two housing projects of which particular mention should be made. One, known as Preston Taylor, is a low-rent federal housing project. The other is a private housing project, College Hill.

Description of our Procedure

Method: The approach we used in working within the district consisted of a door-to-door canvas of homes in the area. Our primary instrument was an interview schedule (copy attached and data included) which proved to be a very effective means of involving respondents in the concern of the project. Although we were primarily interested in the gathering of data we found the schedule to be an important part of the educational process. For example, people who could not name their governmental representatives when asked to do so (Question 7) would often write down the names when informed who they were. Moreover, the open-end questions (Questions 8, 9 and 10) were particularly conducive to arousing discussion.

Finally, Question 8 provided a handy lever in the process of convincing people of the advantages of voting. In connection with this a brochure (enclosed) entitled "Register to Vote" was used both to point out the simplicity of the registration and voting procedures and to emphasize the practical consequences to be gained from use of the ballot.

These two instruments (the schedule and the brochure) were used exclusively for almost the entire project. However, toward the end of the project and particularly as a result of insights we gained into the educational needs of the community during the process of interviewing we developed a pamphlet entitled "You and Your Vote." This pamphlet contained a brief description of metropolitan government, sections on how to vote and how to get the government to act, and a survey of the public records of the district's representatives at all levels of government. It was distributed in the homes we had already visited as well as in new areas.

Another means by which we sought to respond to the educational needs of the community was a series of two citizenship workshops held in the district. Actually the workshops were closely connected with the pamphlet, as the former were primarily attempts to expand and elaborate on the material condensed in "You and Your Vote."

Hours: Our work in the district was confined to the hours of 3:30 to 5:30 in the afternoons and 7:00 to 9:00 in the evenings. The afternoon hours were chosen on the assumption that we would find considerably fewer people at home earlier in the day. This assumption was supported by our experience on those days toward the end of the project when we started canvassing between 2:30 and 3 :30. Many people who were home at the later hour were not home at 2:30. Moreover, on several occasions we awoke people from afternoon naps. The evening hours proved most fruitful in terms of finding the largest number of people at home.

Transportation: Transportation posed a unique problem for the project. One inconvenience was the fact that District 21 is a 45-minute round trip from the County Courthouse where the Registrar's Office is located. Of even greater significance was the fact that the farthest portions of the district were over 15 minutes away from the housing accommodations for the project. In solving this problem we used private cars to transport our group to the district and also in carrying people down to the Registrar's Office.

Registration

In Nashville there is no problem of intimidation of persons seeking to register. The major difficulties we encountered in registering voters revolved around the inaccessibility of the Office, both as to hours and as to location. In compliance with Tennessee law the Registrar's Office is open from 8:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. five days a week. Forty-five days before an election the Office is opened on Saturday mornings and for certain hours during the evening.

The problem this poses for the working man is that he must wait to register until the additional hours are available to him right before an election. In our own registration work this meant that we were able to transport only housewives, people whose jobs enabled them to be home by 3:00 p.m., and persons temporarily unemployed.

A second problem arose from the fact that the location of the Courthouse in the heart of the downtown area added to its inaccessibility. It is true that supplemental registration booths are established along the ten major highways leading into the city 45 days before an election. But no such booths, by order of the Election Commission, are available at other times during the year.

When the project first arrived we hoped that a mobile registration unit might be made available in order to facilitate our work. This would have made a significant difference in the number of people we were able to register, particularly if the hours of such units had been more flexible. (It should be noted that the Committee on Political Education of the A.F. of L.-CIO, which is beginning a mass voter-registration drive, is also interested in obtaining mobile units for use in the factories and other places where large numbers of workers are concentrated.)

We went to the Election Commissioner to see if such units could be established. The Commissioner was uncertain as to whether the law would allow additional units to the ten already provided immediately prior to an election. He was able to secure for us a legal interpretation which said such units were within the confines of the law.

This legal clearance was then presented to the Election Commission. However, it was the opinion of the Commission that mobile units were still not feasible. With the A.F. of L.-CIO Committee on Political Education this same request was presented before the Councilmanic Committee on elections. These and other suggestions were taken under advisement by that committee. At the time of the writing of this report their recommendations had not yet been made.

REGISTRATION STATUS

The purpose of this survey is two-fold: (1.) to ascertain the percentage of the persons of voting age in each household that were registered to vote and (2.) after ascertaining the registration status of the qualified voters to try to persuade the non-registered persons to register. Significant is that the district at the inception was chosen because of its reputation as a low registration district. In the run-off election for councilman from the 21st councilmanic district only slightly more than 1,200 votes were cast, the winning margin being some 400 votes.

Since the major interest of the project was to register voters, an effort was made to determine the reasons for non-registration, though no similar effort was made to determine the reasons for registration. The reason for the concentration on the non-registered voters is that our interest centered mainly on determining ways of encouraging people to register which necessitates some awareness of why people did not register.

Each respondent was asked about the registration status of each person in the household 21 years old or older. Of the 1,960 persons 21 years of age or older in the households visited 1,164 were registered and 728 were not registered. These figures indicate that 58.97% of the people of voting age were registered and may tend to indicate that similar figures may be true for the district as a whole. Non-registered were 37.14%. The registration status of 3.46% of the persons over 21 could not be ascertained because the respondent was uncertain as to the registration status of the other members of their households.

If these figures represent the district as a whole, the registration status is not low as expected. Rather, the seemingly low registration status may be reflected in the large number of children in the neighborhood especially in that the district is largely lower class with a federal low-rent housing project and some near-slum areas. The district has long been under the influence of a ward politician, Mrs. Mabel Suggs, which may account for the relatively high registration.

In a recent study of the Middle Tennessee Voter Registration Project, a majority of the respondents who were not registered indicated that their reasons for not being registered was that they just never got around to it, never thought of it , or that they never registered. The major reason in short being apathy. The sample used in that section of the Middle Tennessee Voter Registration Project study was 91 respondents.

Of the 356 respondents approached here 25.56% indicated that they are unregistered because they have never gotten around to it. Another 19.67% had no reason for being unregistered. Roughly this is 45% or slightly less than half of the total responding to this question. Hence apathy remains a major reason for not registering.

Some 12.64% of the non-registered respondents were unregistered because their registration had been cancelled due to change of address or due to failure to vote for four successive years. This 12.64% represents those who have been previously registered, but for some reason have had their registration cancelled. It is significant that this group at one time thought politics important enough to register.

Why People Are Not Registered

Reasons	Number	Per Centage
Just haven't gotten around to it	91	25.56%
Cancellation as result of changing residence or failure to vote for four successive years	45	12.64%
Haven't had time due to working and other reasons	36	10.11%
Sick or disabled	22	6.17%
Not old enough or just turned 21		5.33%
Other miscellaneous reasons	64	17.97%
Don't know or no idea	70	19.67%

As to those who have recently moved, no effort was made to determine how long they had been relocated, but their response suggests an intention to register. The situation of those who have allowed their registration to lapse due to failure to vote however suggest some apathy. The number of people unregistered because of a change in residence indicates that a ward politician could greatly benefit by knocking on doors of newcomers in the district and helping them re-register.

Twenty-two respondents indicated that they were either permanently disabled or that other illness has prevented them from registering. This number is small, representing only 6.17%, but these people seem unaware of the fact that the Elections Commission can come to their homes to register them under these unusual circumstances. If this percentage is the same for the county as a whole it could be very decisive in a national election or in the election of a councilman-at-large.

A number of younger respondents indicated that their reason for not being registered was that they had just recently become 21. Several indicated that they were not registered because they were not yet 21. Of course those who are 21 are aware that they a eligible to register, but those under 21 are apparently not aware that they do not have to be 21 in order to register provided that they will be 21 on the date of the next general election. This tends to indicate that a program is needed to educate young 20-year-olds as to their right to register prior to their 21st birthday under circumstances where they would otherwise be of voting age on election day.

Miscellaneous reasons were given by 17.97% of the respondents and another 19.67% did not have any reason for not being registered.

Image of the President

During his campaign in 1960, President Kennedy indicated that he supported picketing and sit-ins as legitimate forms of protesting racial discriminations. He has more recently issued an executive order banning racial discrimination in federal housing projects and in private housing developments financed by F.H.A. loans. During the year the President has also submitted to Congress a bill aimed at eliminating discrimination against Negro voters through intimidation on the part of private citizens and also through the discriminatory administration of the literacy test. Finally in June, 1963, the President submitted to Congress an omnibus civil rights bill including sections on voting rights, public accommodations and school desegregation. It can be safely said that Kennedy is making an attempt to alleviate some of the oppressive evils of segregation.

The purpose here is to determine the impact the President has made on the Negro community in the district under investigation. It is noted at the outset that a great deal of the President's action has been as a result of political rather than as the result of a moral commitment on his part. The purpose here, however, is not to investigate the motivation of the President, but to determine what kind of image he has in the minds of the Negro citizens. Also investigated is the knowledge of the specific acts of the President responsible for creating these images.

THINK KENNEDY HAS DONE ENOUGH

	Number	Percentage
No	83	9.29%
Qualified	362	40.53%
Yes	448	51.70%

WHY PEOPLE SAY KENNEDY HAS DONE ENOUGH

Provided Job Opportunities	68
Working for Civil Rights	192
Thinks President is doing all he can; is wonderful	188
Total	448

A majority of the respondents said without qualification that they think President Kennedy had done enough for the Negro. There were 448 such unqualified responses. This represented 51.70% of all of the respondents.

The major reason assigned for the positive attitude toward the President's program was that he has been working for Civil Rights. This feeling is closely associated with Kennedy's Civil Rights Bill, his several fireside chats on Civil Rights, and his recent action in getting Negroes enrolled in the University of Alabama. There was however, among this group of respondents, no indication of awareness that the President's Civil Rights program has come about largely as a response to Negro agitation and litigation.

A second group of respondents indicating a positive attitude toward Kennedy thinks that the President is "wonderful" or doing all he can. This positive attitude is not based upon any specific act that the President has done. However, it indicates a sort of latent awareness that the President has been acting in areas beneficial to the Negro even though they cannot recall any specific thing the President has done to give them a favorable image of him.

A smaller number think Kennedy has done enough because of his efforts to raise wages and to give the Negro better job opportunities. Just prior to this survey, the President had urged the Postmaster General to issue an order to the Lewisville and Nashville Railroad Company to end discrimination or risk a cancellation of all future mail contracts. The Lewisville and Nashville story was given wide coverage in the local newspapers, and this may have influenced those assigning creation of job opportunities as a reason for a positive view of Kennedy's program.

FAVORABLE ATTITUDE TOWARD KENNEDY BY PEOPLE WHO THINK THAT HE HAS NOT DONE ENOUGH

Working for Civil Rights	80
Think the President is doing a great deal for the Negro, though not enough	290
Rated over most Presidents	56
Has helped Negro economically	16
Has not done enough is Civil Rights	11

Note: Many respondents gave more than one reason for their view of the President which accounts for the disparity between the number of qualified responses and the reasons given.

WHY PEOPLE THINK THE PRESIDENT HAS NOT DONE ENOUGH FOR THE NEGRO

Has not provided adequate jobs and salaries	20
Could do more in area of Civil Rights	27
Works too slow on Civil Rights problem	14
Other reasons	23

A large number (40.53 %) say that the President has not done enough, but they indicated that they felt he had done a great deal toward the advancement of the Negro. This group felt that one cannot do enough for the Negro until all segregation is eradicated.

Of the 362 subjects making qualified responses 290 indicated that they think Kennedy has done a great deal.

56 respondents felt that the President compared favorably with Presidents Lincoln and Roosevelt and felt that he was better than most.

84 felt that the President himself could do enough only with the help of the people and the Congress. These people demonstrate an understanding that many dimensions of the Civil Rights problem must be dealt with by people other than the President.

80 persons indicated that they felt the President had made considerable strides in the area of Civil Rights, but adhered to the position that he is not doing enough.

Some 29 respondents indicated that the President had not done enough for the Negro in the area of job and civil rights.

PEOPLE WHO THINK THE PRESIDENT HAS NOT DONE ENOUGH FOR THE NEGRO

Has not provided adequate jobs and salaries	20
Could do more in area of Civil Rights	27
Wouks too slowly on Civil Rights problem	14
Other reasons	23

The number saying flatly that the President had not done enough was very small, representing only 9.29%. They said he had not provided enough jobs and high enough salaries, that he could do a great deal more, or that he was too slow in acting.

Conclusion

Many respondents indicate an awareness of what Kennedy has done to improve the Negro situation. There seems however, to be a need for interpretation of Kennedy's actions in terms of the various factors which have influenced his Civil Rights program. The Negro has power in his ability to swing close political elections with the vote, and in his ability to invoke change through mass demonstrations. What seems lacking is the knowledge that the President is responding to the exercise of this power on their part and that there is a direct positive correlation between the vigor with which the Negro makes his demands and what he gets.

Another significant factor is that the President has not yet been successful in getting any meaningful Civil Rights legislation through Congress this year. The mere proposal of a bill favorable to Civil Rights does not automatically guarantee that such a bill will become law.

Question 8--What would you like to see the government do most i[illegible] few years?

This question was designed to find out the major concerns of the Negro community of District 21 with the hope that this information could be used to interest members of the community in active political participation. It seems that much of the community is not aware of the role which it can play in determoning government action to meet its needs. The intent of the survey was to provide organizations which are attempting to increase political awareness with specific information about the areas in which the community feels that government action is necessary.

This study seems to indicate that the primary needs of this community are economic- the largest number of respondents indicate a desire for better and equal job opportunities, the highest frequency of references to the need for higher wages, for lower taxes, and for lower cost of living reinforce the impression that economics is of major importance. Several attitudes seem to explain partially the fact that the specific concern for job opportunity appears far more often than an inclusive demand for equal rights in all areas. First, there is the feeling that the Negro cannot take advantage of integration in areas of life from which he is barred by his low economic status. For instance, the integration of restaurant facilities is a practical advantage only for those Negroes who have enough money to eat in restaurants. Secondly, there is a confidence that economic advance will give the Negro a position which he can use to overcome either the effects of segregation or segregation itself.

A distinction can be noted between the demands for better and equal job opportunity and a desire for higher salaries and a lower cost of living. The first seems to indicate a desire for status improvement. It shows a concern about the quality and class implications of a job as well as for economic needs. Interest in higher salaries and lower living expenses on the other hand seems to indicate a desire for more money rather than a higher status job.

The second major area of concern seems to be equal rights. This general category includes complete desegregation of public facilities and schools, equal job opportunities, and a variety of miscellaneous amplifications. It may be significant that only 32 references were made to civil rights legislation despite the widespread concern about equal rights.

The demand for improvement of schools appeared with the third highest frequency. It is in keeping with the general recognition of the necessity of education in preparation for better jobs. There seems to be a concern both to meet the rising qualification standards for low status jobs and to prepare students to take advantage of the increasing opportunity to apply for superior jobs.

It is interesting to note that very few respondents specifically expressed interest in integration of the schools. This fact may indicate that most of the community feels that the issue was settled when Nashville adopted a grade a year plan seven years ago. It may also indicate that some people see good education as a necessity in preparing for jobs while, for them, integration is a less immediate concern.

A demand for improved streets appeared almost as often as a desire for better schools. Reference to the need for lighting, sewerage, and drainage reinforce the impression that community improvement is a major concern.

Better housing and increased recreation facilities were the last two desires expressed with any frequency. There were two hundred fifty responses which appeared in small quantities and are classes as miscellaneous. One hundred twenty respondents refused to answer the question or replied that they had no idea what they wanted the government to do.

Summary of responses to Question 8-

1. Provide better and equal job opportunities----------296.
2. Raise wages----------183.
3. Lower taxes----------143.
4. Lower cost of living----------53.
5. Provide equal rights in all areas----------184.
6. Pass civil rights legislation----------32.
7. Improve schools----------124.
8. Improve streets----------103.
9. Provide better housing----------76.
10. Build new and reopen closed recreation centers----------55.
11. Miscellaneous----------250.
12. No answer----------120.

CONCEPT OF LINES OF INFLUENCE

To gain further information on political awareness, respondents were asked "Who do you think is the most influential person in your community?" This question was designed to test the awareness of the informal lines of influence exercized by the leaders in the Negro community. The question did indicate some awareness of this, but it also indicated that many people in naming the most influential person in their community must at the same time define their community.

The results are more meaningful in determining what kind of community the respondents indentify whith, than who really had power, for the respondents responses given suggest that in a lot of instances the persons named were not persons of influence, but of prestige or popularity. The choice of the influential person, however, did indicate with which community the person identified, whether the neighborhood centered around the grocery store, the church, the political district with its councilman, or with the Negroes of Nashville as a whole, led by the civil rights leaders whose scope of operation is the entire city.

There are more responses than the number of respondents, because some respondents named more than one person of influence.

Category	% of total	number of responses	number of names
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	75
1. no idea, no one	44.84	508	0
[illegible]	[illegible]
2. active in politics and elections	10.50	119	25
3. councilman	8.30	94	1
4. good neighbors & good people	8.21	93	73
5. civil rights leaders	6.71	76	12
6. ministers	5.12	58	31
7. business people	4.32	49	30
8. educators & P.T.A. leaders	3.71	42	19
9. housing project managers	2.03	23	2
10. church laymen	1.06	22	17
11. miscellaneous	4.32	49	28
total	99.12%	1133	238

Probably the most significant of all the answers to this question are the ones which say they have no idea as to who is the most influential person. There seems to be no feeling of power structure in the community which is most likely one of the main reasons for the type of response given by 44.84% or almost half of the respondents. The responses in this group were mainly of two types, (1) "I don't know" or "I can't think of anyone", and (2) "No one is influential" or "We are all the same, no one is more important than anyone else". As accurately as can be determined the following breakdown is possible:"I don't know", 443 responses, 30.27% of the total, and "No one is influential", 65 responses, 5.74% of the total.

Councilman John L. Driver was listed by 95 people as most influential, even though he has only been in office since April, 1963. He is a businessman and a newcomer to the council. Mr. Driver's opponent in the election, Mrs. Mable Suggs , was listed by 44 persons. This was a significant election, since Mr. Driver, new to the political scene, defeated Mrs. Suggs who, as a ward politician, has been active for many years.

Only six of the 27 political workers named hold or have held an elective office. Several of the others are those who help on election days by transporting voters to the polls and try to influence voting.

The high number of people who listed those in the category of good neighbors or good people as influential is significant. One reason good neighbors and good people were listed was because the people usually identify with the people in their immediate area, their own street, or dwelling unit it in the housing project. For these reasons, many of the responses were not political, but rather were a listing of one's very close neighbors because they were respectable, understanding, helped one another, or similar reasons. Not only does the community with which these people identify seem to be rather small, but also there is a lack of the awareness of the power structure of the community in which they live. The concept of influence seems to be more or less that of prestige or status.

Of the civil rights leaders mentioned, Attorney Z. Alexander Looby, a Negro, was listed 39 times. He has taken many civil rights cases to court in Nashville, and is a councilman. Rev. Kelly Miller Smith, next with 16 responses, is the president of the Nashville Christian Leadership Council. Although there was a great amount of interest in the community in gaining equal rights, there seemed to be relatively little participation in or identification with the Nashville direct action.

It may be that business people were listed mainly because they were well known, rather than because of the degree of influence they may have, although this is not so of all cases. It may also be assumed that the ranking of some persons was due to their economic power.

Mr. Lorenza Dennis, the director of the Preston Taylor housing project was listed as most influential by 24 persons in the project. He is in position to have a great deal of influence over all of the activities of the housing project which houses over 500 families.

T he fact that nearly half of the respondents had no idea who the most influential person in the community was, suggests a widespread lack of contact with political workers who work to influence decision making in the community and rather, resign themselves to accepting as a way of life the fact that city hall controls the community free and independent of human actions. These findings suggest a need for education of a large number of people as to the ways decisions are made. This type of education is also the first step on the road to participation in community decision making.

KNOWLEDGE OF POLITICAL OFFICALS

In an attempt to get some idea as to the level of political awarness respondents were asked questions designed to determine whet her or no they knew their political leaders. Each respondent was asked to name his councilman, his mayor, his congressman and his senators.

The number of respondents knowing their local officals was about double the number knowing their national representatives. Local officals are more widely known than national officals because of their closeness to the community and because their actions directly affect the lives of the local citizens. National officals on the other hand exert a more indirect influence on the local populace and for that reason are likely to be less widely known. Less than 30% of the respondents knew their national officals while almost 50% know their local officals.

Question 7--Knowledge of Political Officals

	Total responding	#knows	%knows	#doesn't know	%doesn't know
Councilman	989	490	49.55	499	50.45
Mayor	983	666	67.75	317	32.25
Congressman	982	223	22.61	759	77.39
Senators:
Kefauver	982	278	28.32	704	71.68
Gore	987	195	19.76	792	80.24

The councilman was known by 49.55% of the respondents. This is a higher figure than for the national officials, but it is surprising that a much higher percentage of the people did not know him because he is a freshman councilman and the first Negro to be elected in that district. The councilman, John L. Driver, is a businessman in the community who operates a strategically located service station and drive-in restaurant which should expose him to much of the public. Another reason it is surprising that Driver is not known by nearly everyone in his district is that his electi n campaign was a heated one necessitating a run-off between him and a long-time female ward politician, Mrs. Mabel Suggs.

More people knew the may or was the most widely known official. It is understandable that the mayor is so widely known because of his position as chief executive office in the new government which is popular because it is a reform in terms of structure and also because the mayor himself is somewhat of a reformer, noted primarily for his fights against graft and vice. The mayor also gets a great deal of exposure to the public as a result of his name and picture appearing regularly in the newspaper and because of his weekly Sunday afternoon Television Show. The mayor was known b 67.75% of the respondents.

On the national level the late Senator Kefauver was most widely known even though he was known by slightly more than 28.4% of the respondents. Kefauver seemingly would be more widely known due to his long and illustrous political career. He was the man who beat the enemy's machine, who was famous for wearing a coonskin cap, and who was once a candidate for vice president of the United States.

Albert Gore, the other senator, was known by only 19.76% of the respondents.

Richard Fulton, the Congressman was known slightly more than Gore (22.61%). It was expected that more people would know him because in his campaign he promised to hire a Negro secretary and on being elected he became the first Southern Congressman to hire a Negro secretary.

Over all there seems to be a need to undertake a program to raise the level of awareness of national political officials in the Negro community, especially since so much vital civil rights legislation is currently before the Congress.

WHY READ THIS PAMPHLET

The purpose of this pamphlet is to inform you, as registered voters, of the power and responsibility of your vote. It explains what you should expect from your elected officials, what you can demand from them, and how you can make those demands heard.

YOUR METROPOLITAN GOVERNMENT

The new Nashville-Davidson County Metropolitan Government is an experiment in local government being watched throughout the nation. It combines the formerly separate county and city governments into one unit of operation with a new charter and new plans for expanding services to the community. The Metro government has complete or partial control over all of the following community services:

* schools
* roads and streetlights
* garbage collection and sanitation
* buses and taxis
* creation of jobs
* regulation of taxes
* public power
* hospitals and public health facilities
* public welfare services
* police protection
* parks and recreation

HOW TO GET THE GOVERNMENT TO ACT

Many people feel that it is very difficult to get the government to act; consequently, when problems arise they never try to approach their elected officials to see what can be done. The truth, however, is this:

it is easy to get your representative in the local and national government to hear your complaints and to act!

Your mayor, your councilman, your congressional representative, your governor and your senators are all elected by the people and must be sensitive to what the people want.

In short:

they are looking for your vote!

HOW TO GET METRO TO ACT

It is easy to tell Metro what your community needs. To get Metro to pave a street in your neighborhood or to compel the Nashville Transit Authority, for example, to establish a route through your neighborhood you simply follow these easy steps.

* Write to your Councilman: Mr. John Driver
  1018 35th Ave., N.
  Nashville, Tenn.

* Tell him you are a registered voter and explain to him what you want done. (For example, state that you want more recreational facilities for your children).

* If you get other neighbors to sign the letter your councilman will act faster. "There is strength in numbers."

EXAMPLE OF A LETTER OF PETITION TO YOUR COUNCILMAN

Dear Councilman Driver:

We the undersigned are registered voters living in Councilmanic District 21.

We have for some time been inconvenienced by the lack of any good roads or sidewalks down Lena Street. Our children have to walk in the roads and the road is so poor that it is almost impossible to drive on it.

Since we are working people and must use these roads and sidewalks every day, we would like you to have Metro government repair and/or construct these facilities.

(name and address) (name and address)

This is just a sample letter. You need not worry about whether the letter is worded fancy or whether the words are spelled correctly. Your councilman should act anyway.

If you are unsure about the authority of the government to do something, ask your councilman. He is YOUR paid representative and HE IS PAID TO ANSWER YOUR QUESTIONS!

HOW TO GET YOUR NATIONAL GOVERNMENT TO ACT

To get the national government to act you should write your congressman Richard Fulton and your senators Albert Gore and Estes Kefauver. Tell your senators and congressman what you want done.

Also, if a bill is before Congress and you want your congressman or senators to vote for it or to vote against it tell them so.

Remember:

The more neighbors and friends that you can get to write similar letters, the greater are your chances of success. Remember to tell your senators and congressman that you are REGISTERED TO VOTE.

HOW YOU VOTE

REGISTERED CITIZENS MAY VOTE

* You must register at least 30 days before an election.

* Register at the Court House Office, Room 15, ground floor. Hours are 8-4, Monday through Friday.

* 45 days before an election the registration office will be opened on Saturdays and some evenings, in addition to the regular hours. Extra registration booths will be set up and you can check your newspaper for specific hours and locations. But don't forget: You must be registered at least 30 days before an election!

WHERE TO VOTE

The precinct lines which determine where you vote are being redrawn. Most of you who voted at Hadley Park will continue to vote there under the new Metro government. Check your newspaper before an election for the exact location of your poll!

WHEN TO VOTE

Employers are required by law to give employees up to three hours to vote on election day.

HOW TO VOTE

A model voting machine or a large diagram will be available at the polls to teach citizens how to use a voting machine. Most voting machines have a panel with levers which you pull for particular candidates or the party of your choice.

Ask for instruction and for an opportunity to fill out a sample ballot before entering the voting booth. The attendants are there to help you--DO NOT BE AFRAID TO ASK QUESTIONS!

IF YOU WILL BE OUT OF THE CITY:

Notify the Court House Office not more than 40 nor less than 5 days before an election. They will send you a ballot which you can use to vote by mail.

Many people tend to think of politics as something beyond their control and politicians as "being full of promises but never really doing anything."

* Yet how many of us, after an election is over, check up on these men who we have elected and see if they are sticking to their promises (whether we voted for them or not)?
* How many of us write and offer our suggestions or remind them of their duties to every citizen?
* And how many of us use our vote as a just power in influencing politicians to act for us?

oooooooooooooooooooooo

MEN IN YOUR GOVERNMENT:
MEN WHO SHOULD BE ACTING FOR YOU!

GOVERNOR: Frank Clement, Democrat, is Governor of Tennessee. He went into office November, 1962, and his term expires November, 1966. He has served as governor before. In campaigning this time he "stood on his record" in regard to Civil Rights, pointing to Clinton Tennessee where he called in the National Guard to enforce desegregation of a school.

He has promised a number of times to form a human relations commission for Tennessee, but at the writing of this, the commission has still not been formed. In some instances, where pressure has been brought, he has acted for Civil Rights.

You can write him at the following address:

Governor Clement
State Capitol
Nashville, Tennessee

MAYOR: Beverly Briley, Democrat, is Mayor of Metropolitan Nashville. He went into office in 1962, and his term expires in 1966. Prior to this, Briley was a County Judge. In his campaign he made no civil rights promises and ran as the more conservative candidate. Since being in office, however, he has formed a city bi-racial committee and has given some Negroes positions on city council boards. His address is:

Mayor Beverly Briley
Court House
Nashville, Tennessee

CITY COUNCILMAN: John Driver, Democrat, is Representative on the City Council for District 21. He went into office this April, and his term expires in 1967. This is Driver's first venture into politics. He is and has been a businessman in the community. In his campaign he emphasized better schools and streets, more and better paying jobs, increase in teachers' pay, and clean economical government. There have been community improvements. However, it is still too early in his administration to make an overall judgment.

Mr. Driver serves on four committees in the city council. They are:

* health, hospitals and welfare
* highways, traffic and parking
* planning and urban renewal
* aviation

Mr. Driver's home address and business address are:

Councilman John Driver
1018 35th Ave., N. or Shell Service
Nashville, Tenn. 28th and Jefferson

The best way to decide whether your elected official is doing a good job is to check his voting record on issues that concern you. Just as a man's actions speak louder than his words, the way your congressman or senators vote on different bills is going to speak louder than any campaign promise. The CONGRESSIONAL QUARTERLY, or a good local newspaper can provide this information.

HOW HAVE YOUR REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS VOTED?

YOUR CONGRESSMAN: Richard Fulton was elected in November, 1962, and his term expires in November, 1964. So far Fulton has not had the opportunity to vote on any important bills in the area of civil rights, employment, and health, education and welfare.

Because he is a "liberal" Democrat, it is hoped that he will vote for President Kennedy*s proposals in these areas. Nashville newspapers will carry accounts of how he has voted when important bills come up. Besure to follow Fulton's actions closely between now and his time for re-election.

YOUR SENATORS: Estes Kefauver was reelected to the Senate in November, 1960, and his term expires in November, 1966. He is a Democrat.

Albert Gore was reelected to the Senate in November, 1958, and his term runs out in November 1964. Gore is also a Democrat.

THEIR VOTING RECORD IN MAJOR AREA OF LEGISLATION

CIVIL RIGHTS

The most important forms which civil rights legislation has taken under Kennedy has been:

* measures to limit use of the filibuster (when a minority of the senators, usually Southern senators, try to kill a bill they oppose by talking about it endlessly). The filibuster is most often used against civil rights legislation.
* attempts to withhold federal funds from public accomodations which discriminate on the basis of race in any of their facilities (for example, withhold money from segregated schools and hospitals); and to increase national government action in situations where discrimination is most likely to occur (for example, in registration and voting).

But what have your senators done about these things? Are they for you or against you?

* Both GORE and KEFAUVER voted AGAINST STOPPING the FILIBUSTER in 1962. In 1963, however Gore supported the effort to cut off debate.
* Both senators are generally against putting restrictions on the use of government money by public facilities. This is because Southern politicians as a whole are afraid of increased "interference" on the part of the national government, and would like to decrease rather than increase its role in almost every field.

* Both men did vote to continue the Civil Rights Commission and end poll taxes in federal elections.

EMPLOYMENT

* Supported Kennedy's Fair Labor Standards Ammendment of 1961 which added 15¢ and 4 1/2 million workers to the old bill's coverage.

* Both voted for a training program for unemployed workers. 1961 and 1962 measures.
* Kefauver in 1961 co-sponsored a bill to ease unemployment where crisis economic conditions existed.

HEALTH, EDUCATION AND WELFARE

* Both voted for Public Works Act of 1962.
* Both supported the creation of an Urban Affairs Housing Department at the Cabinet level.
* Both Senators have introduced legislation in this area with specific concern for *hospitals, *health services for the aged; *scholarships for students of medicine and public health; * the prevention and control of juvenile delinquency; *and the expansion of public loan programs.

Senators Kefauver and Gore are in Washington to serve the registered voters of Tennessee. They are paid from your taxes. Check up on their performances by reading your newspapers. If what they are doing pleases or displeases you, let them know. If you want them to vote FOR THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL, WRITE THEM TO DO SO!

Their address is SENATE OFFICE BUILDING
WASHINGTON 25, D.C.

AIDS TO BECOMING BETTER INFORMED CITIZENS

* Watch Mayor Briley's show, Ask the Mayor, Sunday night, 10:15, WLAC-TV, Channel 5, on which the Mayor answers questions about the new Metro government.

* Watch news programs and reports on world affairs always listed ahead of tim in the paper.

* Watch for information from the Davidson County Independent Political Council--it is helpful and important.

* Attend the community meetings with Councilman Driver at Hadley Park center the third Wednesday of each month at 8:00 p.m.

* Join an organization such as the Nashville Christian Leadership Conference, The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, all of which are working hard on the problem of gaining first class citizenship for Negroes.

APRIL 6-13

"THE CHURCH ON FRONTIERS OF FERMENT"

COORDINATOR: MISS ELLA BAKER, Consultant in Student Relations, Southern Regional YWCA

CHAPLAIN: THE REVEREND HARRY SMITH, Presbyterian University Pastor, University of North Carolina

"In the midst of a world-wide move to uniformity which is destroying local and regional uniqueness, the South continues to hold on to much that is easily identifiable as Southern. Yet the personal, traditional quiet of an Atlanta Garden Club is affected by the impact of daily, impersonal mass movements set to clocks and directed by traffic signals. Technological advances destroying the roots of life embodied in the myth, magic and legend of diversified cultures throw together the uprooted industrial engineer from the North, the plantation-oriented, fatherly manager and place rural folk in the very middle of a social situation that lacks definition, values and primary controls. Atlanta, one of the South's leading cities, struggles valiantly to maintain her distinctiveness and charm while adjusting to the pressures that try to mold her into just another modern, urban city. The church cannot remain aloof, for God's people are part of Atlanta and the life of the church in Atlanta depends greatly on how it interprets and carries out its mission in the present situation."

Leaders from Atlanta's schools, businesses, civic groups and churches will lead the seminar participants through this intensive examination of "The Church on Frontiers of Ferment."

MEMORANDUM TO LESTER B. GRANGER, Executive Secretary, National Urban League

FROM GUY B. JOHNSON, Executive Director, Southern Regional Council

SUBJECT: SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

(1). The Southern Regional Council is a voluntary organization. Membership is on an individual basis, but many members are heads of institutions or organizations. We try to get a wide range of occupational representation. Since we began operation as an organized body only six months ago and have been busy with organizational details, we are just beginning to expand our membership. We have at present about 350 members, but we expect to have about 1,000 before the year is out. For further information on membership and structure, see Part II, page 5 of the Southern Regional Council Pamphlet No. 1.

(2). Our overall program is, of course, broader than the problem of race relations, but we realize that every major Southern problem is definitely intertwined with the race problem. Our specific interests for the near future are the following:

(a) To promote the observance of the letter and spirit of the Supreme Court decision in the Texas primary case.

(b) To stimulate state and local interest and action in the problem of planning for interracial justice and peace in the post-war period.

(c) To promote a greater measure of fairness in employment practices in the South in the post-war era.

(d) To initiate studies and recommendations on fair standards of wages and hours in the field of household employment.

(e) To develop studies, conferences, and a handbook on the relation of the police to interracial problems.

For further points, see Part III, page 6 of the SRC Pamphlet No. 1.

(3). Our By-laws provide for an annual meeting of members. This meeting will take place on the second Wednesday of October. Since we have had no member meeting except the charter meeting, we can not say what proportion of our membership attends. We have a Board of Directors which will meet at the same time as the annual meeting of members, but which may hold as many other regular or special meetings as it desires. We also have an Executive Committee which meets on call of the chairman or of any three Committee members, and which, of course, serves as the planning and advisory group in the intervals between member or Board meetings. For composition of the Board of Directors, see Appendix G of the pamphlet. The Executive Committee is composed of the officers listed on page 20 of the pamphlet, plus the following elected members: Charles S. Johnson, Chairman, Francis R. Bridges, Jr., Rufus E. Clement, Leonard Haas, Gordon B. Hancock, Msgr. T. James McNamara, and Josephine Wilkins. Other Committees of the Council are Membership, Publications, Finance, Fellows, and Public Relations.

(4) We have a working budget and a paid staff. Our income is derived from membership dues and contributions, foundation grants, and gifts from various organized bodies, particularly church groups.

(5) Our Council is definitely concerned over "racial tension." In the short time that we have been operating, we have tried in a broad way to relieve tensions. For example, just before the Alabama and Florida primaries, we issued a resolution which had been adopted unanimously by the Board of Directors condemning the race-baiting which was being used in political campaigns. (For the text of this resolution, see the SOUTHERN FRONTIER of May, 1944.) Working quietly with other organizations and with individuals, we have stimulated a number of public statements, feature articles, editorials, open letters, etc., which are calculated to lift the morale of liberal and progressive people in the South.

(6) Since we are still very young, we can not point to very many definite accomplishments as yet. However, we are on the way. In addition to the sort of thing which I pointed out under (5), we have been concerned with the revitalization of existing state or local interracial groups, and have encouraged the formation of new groups which are interested in human relations, democracy, etc. We have been successful in cultivating friendly relations with numerous organizations and agencies such as the liberal church groups in the South, the Urban League, the NAACP, the Associated Press, TIME and LIFE, etc. I might add that we did some intensive work to prevent race friction on the occasion of the July 4 primary in Georgia. There was a great deal of tension built up, particularly in Atlanta. We kept out of the limelight, but we worked hard to get some constructive things in the newspapers and at getting the "right people" to use some personal influence where it would do the most good. We are positive that our efforts were in large measure responsible for the fact that there were no incidents on July 4. Of course, a part of the success of this sort of technique lay in our willingness to keep in the background, so if you use this Atlanta dope in your article, use it in a general way as an example of a technique. I am sure that at this stage of the game, certain people who were influenced could not have been influenced as easily if we, as an organization, had been making a direct approach.

Dear Mr. Granger:

Thank you for your request for certain information concerning the Southern Regional Council for use in the article which you are preparing for the SURVEY GRAPHIC. The enclosed memorandum will, I hope, serve your purposes. I am sending under separate cover a copy of our pamphlet entitled "The Southern Regional Council, Its Origin and Purpose," and some other material which might be of use to you in the preparation of your article. If you need any additional information, do not hesitate to call on me.

I am sorry that I could not be at the Fisk Institute of Race Relations at the same time you were there. Dr. Alexander, who was here for a committee meeting last Saturday, reported that you made an outstanding contribution to the Institute.

With all good wishes,

Sincerely yours,

Dr. Guy Johnson, Director
Southern Regional Council
710 Standard Building
Atlanta, Georgia

My dear Doctor Johnson:

I have been asked by the SURVEY GRAPHIC to prepare for its fall issue an article on national developments in the field of race relations, giving a critical evaluation of the numerous approaches being made to this important problem. I am anxious, of course, to give as complete coverage as possible to the work of the various interracial committees engaged in such activity. In this connection, I am seeking your assistance.

Would you be good enough to let me have a statement on your committee giving as much of the following information as may be applicable to its organization and program:

1. From whom is the authority of your committee derived, e.g., was it appointed by a public official or is it a voluntary association of individuals? If the latter is true, do the members represent various organizations or do they serve as individuals?

2. Do you have a specific program outlined with objectives and techniques for achieving these objectives, or do you merely "hold a watching brief" for the state of race relations? If the latter is true, are you organized so as to take official action in case of "incidents"? What form would such action take?

3. How often do you meet? What proportion of the membership attends? Do you have an executive committee or any central planning group, or are all meetings of the entire membership?

4. Do you have a working budget or paid staff? If not, has any professional personnel been loaned to your committee by other organizations or agencies?

5. Is your committee concerned over "racial tension"? If so, what definite steps have been taken to relieve tensions?

6. Can you relate any definite accomplishments that may be listed to the credit of your committee during the past year?

If you have any additional facts, statistics or reports which you wish to send along to supplement your statement, I shall be ever so happy to have them.

The article is due early in September. I should be grateful, therefore, if you could let me have this information by the 15th of August.

I shall be deeply appreciative of your cooperation.

Sincerely yours,

Lester B. Granger

COPY FOR DR. REID

September 29, 1944

Mr. Lester B. Granger, Executive Secretary
National Urban League
1133 Broadway, Room 826
New York, New York

Dear Mr. Granger:

Some time ago the New York Times carried a story of the National Urban League's proposed community project to help improve race relations and avoid postwar conflict in industrial centers. We noted that the initial plan called for demonstration in five urban areas with a possible final coverage of thirty industrial areas. I am writing to commend to the national agencies sponsoring this study the necessity for conducting one of these long range projects in a Southern city.

All of the agencies at work in this region are aware of the necessity for a specialized job in the field of the project's interest. Certainly, if the project's emphasis is to be placed upon eliminating "racial friction from postwar reconversion and redevelopment programs" there is need for doing such a demonstration in the South where race relations are tautest and where the industrial reconversion program may be more drastic. Furthermore, the South has a much larger percentage of war facility contracts than other regions. This fact in itself bespeaks the need for some special study or action.

In view of these facts, as well as our interest in the matter, would the National Urban League be willing to include in its initial study such an industrial center as Birmingham, Alabama? Would it consider working on this problem in one of the following areas: New Orleans, Louisiana; Charleston, South Carolina; Houston, Texas; Memphis, Tennessee; or Atlanta, Georgia? The Southern Regional Council is willing to cooperate with the agencies in making such a study effective in this region. Meanwhile, I shall be pleased to have your reaction to this suggestion.

Cordially yours,

GUY B. JOHNSON
Executive Director

NEW GROUP TO EASE NEGRO'S PROBLEMS

N.Y. Times 8/28/44

Will Organize Local Leaders in Five Demonstration Cities to Remove Racial Tension

The National Urban League announced yesterday from its headquarters, 1133 Broadway, the start of a new community project to help improve race relations and avoid post-war racial conflict. Financed by the General Education Board, the project is one of the league's efforts to eliminate racial friction from post-war reconversion and redevelopment programs of American industrial centers.

Five demonstration cities will be selected in the Midwest and East in which local leaders will be organized for removal of racial tension by eliminating its causes. As the project develops, its findings and results will be shared with leaders in other cities that are faced by signs of rising racial disturbance.

A number of other national agencies with local contacts in the cities studied will be associated with the Urban League in the project. Among the organizations invited to cooperate are the Boy Scouts of America, Child Welfare League, Family Welfare Association, National Board of the Young Women's Christian Association, National Committee on Housing, National Federation of Settlements, and National Tuberculosis Association. An advisory committee, representing participating agencies, will be headed by Mrs. Alfred H. Schoellkopf, treasurer of the National Urban League.

Supervisors of Project Named

The project will be supervised and administered by Warren M. Banner, director of research and community projects for the league, and William H. Dean, Professor of Sociology at Atlanta University.

A professional staff assisting in the project will include specialists in employment, housing, health, recreation and group work and family and child care. These specialists will give advisory service in each community, guided by analyses of social and economic conditions already prepared by an advance research staff. Studies will be made upon invitation of local social work and inter-racial leaders, who also will assume responsibility for carrying out recommendations of the visiting specialists. The project is intended to demonstrate the responsibility and opportunity of organized social work in improving race relations and adjusting Negro newcomers in the life of the community.

Though only five cities have been chosen for intensive work during the first year of the project, the National Urban League plans to continue its program until at least thirty industrial centers have been covered.

Value of Project Stressed

The importance of the project was emphasized in a statement made to the General Education Board by William H. Baldwin, president of the National Urban League, in which he declared:

"Approximately 600,000 Negroes have been included in the migration of war workers from rural to urban and from Southern to Northern areas. Their entry into these areas has been accompanied by rising signs of community hostility against their presence. Community leadership has been unprepared both from the standpoint of emotional attitudes and from that of community facilities to welcome and adjust the Negro increases. A significant factor, also, is the hysteria which the community experiences because of the uncertainty and stress of war. Most of these racial problems can be traced directly back to lack of planning for housing, health, recreation, child care and education of Negro newcomers. In general, all of these problems result from an absence of instructed and intelligently organized community leadership."

NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE
SUMMARY OF ACTIVITIES FOR THE YEAR 1944

::::::::::::

The Third Full Year of War

The year 1944 was a year of important developments in race relations. Premature hopes of early victory in the European war faded as Germany dug in to protect her "inner fortress". A drift of workers from war industries to seek peacetime jobs with greater security was strongly condemned by national spokesmen. In a revulsion of public opinion against the disastrous race riots of 1943, hundreds of American communities organized official or unofficial committees to promote better race relations and public morale. The year also witnessed further closing of the gap between an effective "all-out" war program and participation of Negro citizens in that program.

An Important American Movement

In all of these developments, the National Urban League further justified its position as an important American movement - a war-service agency linking the welfare of Negroes to that of the whole American people, and integrating the efforts of Negro citizens into the total victory program.

The League has been even more than this. It is a constant and impressive demonstration of the fact that without thought of selfish group interests Negro and white Americans not only can, but do work together for the "common good of our common city, our common country". In the League's national headquarters, and in fifty cities of the country, there are more than two thousand active members of Urban League boards and committees attacking problems of employment, housing, health, recreation, education and racial tension. The number of full-time employed staff members has risen to three hundred - thirty of them in the national office. A sum of $100,000 expended by the National Office in 1944 was supplemented by an additional $700,000 expended by local Leagues.

How the Money was Spent

How was this money spent? What definite results have come from the organized activities of these thousands of public-spirited citizens? A detailed report is too long even for our formal printed report which will appear early in 1945. This summary points to only a few of the highlights of the 1944 program.

National staff and board members travelled far and wide over the country. They visited war industry communities, investigated problem situations, sat in conferences with local leadership, made recommendations involving improvement of governmental services and social welfare programs. They advised on policies and programs in race relations, assisted management representatives in war plants and spokesmen for labor groups in those same plants in disposing of vexatious racial questions.

Working with Government

There was steady travel and extensive correspondence between the National Office and Washington, D. C. Heads of federal war agencies acknowledged the value of Urban League advice and turned to the League for support in order to develop the utmost cooperation between Government and Negro citizens during a time of national emergency. Out of these conferences came the commissioning of Negro specialists by the War Department in its Industrial Personnel Division and in its Separation and Classification Centers. There was special indoctrination of Army guidance counselors to insure the best possible advice for Negro soldiers about to be separated from the armed services and returned to civilian life. Much of the League's printed material has been used by army officials in developing this training program. The Office of Price Administration has several times mentioned outstanding service rendered by the League in the fight against black markets and inflation. The National Housing Agency, the Fair Employment Practice Committee, the Selective Service Bureau and the War Emergency Commission have also received and warmly acknowledged the League's advisory and cooperating services.

Working in War Industry

In two thousand war plants distributed throughout the country, League staff members have worked for the unrestricted use of Negro workers at their fullest possible skills. The Industrial Relations Laboratory of the National Urban League concentrated on three hundred of these plants in which more than 150,000 Negro workers are employed. Located in twenty-five states and 102 cities, these plants furnish a true sample of war industry.

National field staff have visited and corresponded with plant management, labor leadership and the Negro workers themselves in these "Laboratory plants". Racial problems have been ironed out, often as soon as they appear. The performance of Negro labor has been improved because of advice on personnel policies and in-plant situations. From among these three hundred employers, written commitments from 247 indicate continued post-war employment of Negroes at skilled and semi-skilled jobs. In only eleven plants has management reported unsatisfactory experience with Negro workers, and from only twenty-two have reports come of serious racial difficulties. The Industrial Relations Laboratory project, made possible through a grant by the Julius Rosenwald Fund, is the first case of its kind in American industrial history. Its findings stand as an authentic report, verified by industrial management itself, on the successful use of Negro workers and their outstanding contribution to production-for-victory.

Social Statesmanship in Community Relations

Social pioneering, such as this, has always been a characteristic of the Urban League program, and this period of wartime change has stimulated similar efforts in other fields. A grant from the General Education Board has made possible another planning project - this one in the field of community relations. With the cooperation of twelve other national social service agencies, the National Urban League has chosen certain war industry centers in which racial tensions and other social problems have resulted from the migration of Negro workers and from failure to provide for their social needs.

Into these communities the League is sending staffs of survey and consultant specialists. Community studies are carried on to reveal the causes and extent of social maladjustments. Interracial and social service committees are formed to help devise plans and recommendations for the removal of these problems. Specialists in such fields as employment, housing, health, recreation, and family service remain behind to assist local leadership in carrying the recommendations out.

As each community is studied and progress made toward correction of problem situations, the findings are shared with other industrial centers similarly plagued by racial problems. The importance of this project can best be measured by remembering the bloody and costly race riots that followed the last World War in such cities as Chicago and East St. Louis, Illinois, and even in Washington, D. C. Here again, the Urban League has established a "first" in social planning and community organization.

Building Public Opinion

The League's attention has also been turned towards the great opinion makers of the country - national radio networks, important metropolitan newspapers, the Negro weekly press, journals of scientific and professional interest and the League's own special publications. Through all of these channels the League constantly emphasizes the urgent necessity of interracial cooperation toward winning the war and solving the problems of racial inequality. For the second consecutive year "Victory Through Unity Week" was set aside by Governors of a number of states and Mayors of numerous cities in observance of the National Urban League's Annual Conference. Messages from the President of the United States and the Governors matched by equally strong statements made by leaders of American industry, organized labor, and governmental departments constituted another powerful factor affecting public opinion on war-time race relations.

The Southern Field

The racial trouble center of the nation - the Deep South - has steadily shifted northward as large numbers of Negroes and whites from southern areas have migrated into border states and northern industrial communities. Urban League action has been aimed not only at protecting democratic standards in northern areas but also at ameliorating conditions and removing causes of racial conflict in the Deep South itself. The Southern Field Division of the National Urban League has been reorganized, and the results of that reorganization have already been seen in the establishment of the first Urban League in the State of Texas in Fort Worth.

New Leagues and Service Councils

Not only in the South, but also throughout the country, there has been a call for increased guidance and service from the League movement. As the result of those calls, new Urban Leagues have been established in points as far separated as Elizabeth, New Jersey; Portland, Oregon; Phoenix, Arizona; as well as Fort Worth, Texas. Urban League organizing committees are now busy in half a dozen other industrial centers. In other cities not yet ready for formal Urban League affiliation, Service Councils have been established as volunteer interracial groups which carry on in the Urban League tradition under guidance from our field staff.

Problems and Plans for 1945

The year 1945 promises no let-up in the responsibilities placed upon League leadership. As more and more citizens of both races become aware of the importance of League service, the number and urgency of additional calls for advice and assistance steadily rise. These calls will continuously increase as the closing war effort becomes more extreme. Splits will grow between special interest groups, racial conflict will threaten more and more frequently, demobilization and reconstruction plans for the post-war period will lay a heavy accent upon the factor of race. Whether Negro workers remain in their new homes and seek to retain industrial employment, or whether they re-migrate back to the areas from which they came in such large numbers, this Negro group of demobilized industrial veterans will require guidance, support and inspiration. The return of discharged service men, already in process, will swell by the thousands and hundreds of thousands. Problems of re-employment, adjustment to civilian status, reorganization of permanent family life, rehabilitation of the handicapped - these are only a few of the problems in which Urban League leadership will be badly needed. There must be, and there will be no lessening of League activity. There must be no weakening of League influence.

A Larger Budget for a Bigger Job

All of this calls for financial expenditures greatly exceeding those of 1944. The past year has called for the largest budget in the League's history, simply because the job which the League has undertaken is the biggest in our entire experience. The job ahead will progressively increase and until that job is completed we will not desist from our task. During 1944, we spent approximately $100,000 - every dollar of which yielded inestimable dividend. Our budget for 1945 is set at $152,000 - a minimum figure in view of the needs to be served. We ask for support of every member and friend of the National Urban League in making 1945 a year of unparalleled service to the Nation and one of fulfilled opportunity for interracial betterment.

My dear Doctor Johnson:

The current issue of OPPORTUNITY, Journal of Negro Life, presents an accurate, comprehensive account of the Negro in the Armed Forces of this Nation. This is the most complete account now available on the contributions made by almost a million Negro men and women to the prosecution of the war. Profusely illustrated, this issue of OPPORTUNITY presents a clear-cut, attractive picture which will be interesting to all who wish to keep abreast of important activities on the American scene.

In order to promote as wide reading as possible of this important material, we have prepared a fly-leaf which we are asking a number of organizations to distribute through their regular channels. A copy of the fly-leaf is attached to this letter.

Will you be good enough to let me know as soon as you can, how many of these you would like to have sent to your desk in order that you may supply them to interested persons or organizations on your regular mailing list? We are in position to send these to you in whatever quantity you may wish to have them.

Very sincerely yours,

PLANNING FOR VETERANS IN THE LOCAL COMMUNITY

By Julius A. Thomas
Director, Department of Industrial Relations
NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE
1133 Broadway
New York 10, N. Y.

To what extent are American communities preparing for the return of some 8,000,000 service men and women to civilian life? This important question is raised primarily to emphasize an equally important fact. Mainly, readjustment for the vast majority of veterans means returning to St. Paul, or Buffalo, or Birmingham, where family and relatives live. It means getting a job, finding a house, and re-establishing community relationships, returning to school, and a hundred other things that identify people with their immediate environment. How, then, should communities plan so that the veteran's task can be simplified? What resources in the community should be lined up behind the over-all program of veterans' services?

It is probably too early to evaluate such progress as has been noted in this connection, but it is clearly evident that there are many different plans - some good and others not so good. For example, in one midwestern city, the Civilian Defense organization has taken over the problems of returning veterans, thus excluding many other agencies whose services will eventually be needed. In still another town, a battle royal is raging over the selection of the appropriate organization to coordinate services for veterans. It is reported that sharps and slickers in some communities are angling for control of certain services and preparing to "take 'em for a ride" as soon as they get back. Perhaps the most pathetic situation to be observed is the unorganized community in which every public-spirited group has singled out a certain kind of veteran for special attention. In these towns, we may expect the veteran to be literally "torn to pieces" before he is readjusted or rehabilitated. Undoubtedly, a number of groups and organizations, motivated by sincere desires to help and spurred by a sense of patriotic responsibility, are at this moment making plans to aid veterans when they return. A few suggestions may, therefore, serve a useful purpose.

To begin with, it will be an unfortunate occurrence if, in our zeal to help, we overlook certain fundamentals. The majority of veterans don't want to talk too much about their war experiences. Neither are they too anxious to be lionized as heroes. They would prefer forgetting much of the horrible nightmare from which they have only partially awakened. This will be especially true of wounded veterans.

From the most reliable sources of information about veterans' post-war plans, their chief concern seems to be returning to a job. The possibility that there will not be enough jobs appears to be the most disturbing prospect when the war is over. It would seem, therefore, that every community should be planning now for jobs. This means that employer groups, business leaders, government agencies, labor groups, social work organizations and other interested groups should thoroughly examine community resources that may afford work opportunities. G. I. Joe will appreciate this bit of help and he will remember it long after the big public reception that was given in his honor.

Another important service the veteran will need is related to one of the nation's most pressing problems - housing. Few communities have adequate housing even before the veteran returns. That this problem will be accentuated after the war is almost certain. The up-and-doing community that plans for the construction of substantial moderately priced houses that can be purchased by veterans will be performing a real service.

The Veterans Administration and its related agencies will be expected to assist veterans with many of their problems. The quality of this service is, therefore, very important since local offices will become the point of actual contact with veterans. Community groups may well interest themselves in certain aspects of the establishment of these agencies. Close cooperation between these official or public agencies and voluntary or private agencies will be both desirable and necessary. Among other things, this kind of teamwork can eliminate a number of headaches when there are differences of opinion as to who does what. Veterans have already complained that they are "referred" too often and to too many places because they were given incorrect information about the agency which was expected to assist them. Some communities are successfully meeting this problem by establishing "one-stop" Veterans' Information Centers. This procedure cannot be too strongly recommended.

It is almost impossible to complete any discussion of broad social or public programs without some pointed comments regarding the participation of Negroes. There is no other justification for them, except the fact that America has thought bi-racially and lived bi-racially so long that it is difficult to plan without racial bi-focals. Of course, Negro veterans will require and are entitled to exactly the same services and assistance that other veterans are expecting. Is there any reason to feel that the factor of race will affect adversely the Negro veteran's chances for getting these services on a fair and impartial manner? To answer this question affirmatively is not a pleasant task, but in the light of past experiences, one must be realistic. It is highly probable that in many communities, the needs of Negro veterans will not be satisfactorily met unless there is better planning than is evident at this point.

Take the matter of employment, for example. Is there any reason to believe many employers will continue their war-time employment policies once the war is won and government regulations are relaxed? Does anyone believe the average community will change its attitudes and practices in the matter of renting or selling houses to Negro veterans? Have you heard any restaurant or theater operator say he will change his discriminatory business practices when the war is over? These are but a few of the community problems that must be faced and solved before we can truthfully say we are planning to receive our returning heroes. Has your community tackled them?

VETERANS' EMPLOYMENT

I am pleased to take part in this Forum because I have always been a firm believer in the adage that "The Lord helps those who help themselves." That has been the policy of the National Urban League and I congratulate you for taking definite, affirmative and positive steps to solve the problems with which you have charged yourself. I have studied many of your reports. I am acquainted with your purposes and your work. I have observed that you offer no remedy until you have made a thorough study of the problem. This is always an honest approach, and I hope that the work of your organization will continue to be as productive of the good results you seek as your splendid efforts deserve.

For almost a quarter of a century as the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, it has been my privilege as well as my official responsibility to carry out the laws of the Nation as they provide various rights, benefits and privileges for former members of the military and naval forces of the United States and for their dependents and survivors. No distinction has ever been made by that Administration between veterans because of race, color or creed. This is, of course, as it should be. It is one of the things for which America is now fighting. Indeed, any distinction between veterans, or between any citizens, veterans or non-veterans, in face of the glorious record of achievement recorded by fighting men of all creeds and colors, would be not only a betrayal of our trust, but a desecration of the graves of those who died that tolerance and freedom of opportunity might be forever established as a fundamental precept in the life of our Nation. One cannot know contemporary history, one cannot read the story of our troops in the present war, one cannot visualize the look of dismay, surprise and defeat on the faces of the Nazi "supermen" in Italy when, having chosen our colored regiments as "easy pickings", they suddenly found themselves engulfed in a maelstrom of death and destruction, without a feeling that to deny equal opportunity to all is to deny truth itself. It is, therefore, only from an abundance of caution, and not from a question of right or justice, that we study the future employment problem of the Negro.

In order to understand the problem of tomorrow, it is necessary to think back on the situation as it was yesterday, and as it is today. It is estimated that after the war there will be a Negro veteran load of at least a million men and women to be served in our reemployment problem. The records of the Selective Service System indicate that the percentage of Negroes deferred as occupying essential jobs in industry jumped in three years from .7 of 1 percent to 4.4 percent. Those deferred as occupying essential jobs, important to our national health, safety and interest, jumped in three years from 1.5 percent to 5.2 percent.

One of the significant changes that has taken place in the character of Negro employment is in its shift from the farm to industry. About 13 percent of Negro labor left the farm, and about the same percentage entered industry. This increased volume of employment in industry is significant, but even more significant than the volume is the fact that this increase represents, to a large extent, labor which in three years has been upgraded so that now it is a part of the skilled and trained service in the various mechanical, commercial and industrial fields of endeavor.

Negro employment in government has increased from 60,000 to 273,000 from 1940 to 1944. More than 4,000 Negro women, many of them officers, are now in the Army and the Navy.

The upgrading of the Negro in all fields of employment was due first, to the opportunities presented because of war's necessities, and secondly, because of the ability of those men and women to seize upon and take advantage of the opportunities presented. Those who would bar further progress in this direction and those who would attempt to wipe out the gains already made, would outrage not only our sense of justice and our appreciation of a task well done, but would deny to postwar America a live, potent force, capable of a very substantial contribution to successful conversion from a war to a peacetime economy. Speaking now as a veteran, as well as in my official capacity, and bespeaking, I am sure, the feeling of all veterans, it is my hope that American industry which appears so well satisfied with the performance of Negro labor in war time, will continue its employment policy in time of peace.

One of the important factors to be considered in connection with the postwar employment of the Negro veteran is that of the experience and training acquired by him in the armed forces. In the Army and the Navy, in the Marine Corps and the Coast Guard, the Negro has displayed great courage, valor and heroism as a fighting man on land, on sea, and in the air.

In addition to his skill as a fighting man, the Negro has acquired many skills which have their counterpart in civil life. At the Separation Centers, before these men are returned to civil life, they are advised of the civilian occupations which are the equivalent of the activities in which they were engaged in various military capacities. It is normal, therefore, that these men should seek employment where they can utilize those skills. This is a right which should not be denied them.

In many cases those men who left the farm to enter upon military service may not wish to return to farm life. They may seek employment in industry and may attempt to establish themselves in industrial centers, which under normal conditions, cannot absorb them either in employment or in proper housing. Without denying any veteran an equal opportunity of employment, it is well that you, as well as the Government, study this problem with a view of preventing, for the sake of the veteran as well as the community, adding to over-congestion in already over-crowded centers of population. It is hoped that there will be jobs for everybody and that every veteran may find work and suitable living conditions wherever it is his desire to settle. However, in this connection it is well to recognize that of the million Negroes who have been inducted into the armed forces, 750,000 came from the South and that about 70 percent of these came from the farms of the South. It is, of course, unlikely that all will wish to return to the South or to the farm. It is recommended, therefore, that studies be made as to the best place and method of utilizing and the placement of the new skills which they have acquired.

I have been asked to discuss with you the question of the retraining and reemployment of veterans.

While I have but one head, and sometimes in these busy days I experience a little difficulty in keeping that head on my shoulders, I have, nevertheless, many hats - one hat as the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, another as the Administrator of the Retraining and Reemployment Administration, another as the Chairman of the Veterans Placement Service Board, and innumerable hats to carry out my various responsibilities as doctor, lawyer, banker, teacher, employment manager, and agricultural consultant under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, commonly known as the "G. I. Bill of Rights." But each hat represents the expressed desire on the part of Congress, representing the voice of America, to give help, assistance and preference to the veteran. I am glad to say, that which I am sure you already know, that in all legislation affecting veterans, no distinction is ever made either in the letter or spirit of the law, between veterans because of race, color or creed.

It is my hope that American business and industry will endeavor to prevent any discrimination in meeting their employment problems, not because of any compulsion by law, or by reason of any mandate issued by the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practice, but in appreciation of the service rendered by the Negro in time of war.

The Selective Service System, in carrying out its responsibility to render aid to veterans seeking reinstatement in their former position, has appointed many Negro reemployment committee-men. General Hershey, as Director of the Selective Service System, has designated Negro officers with the specific responsibility of cooperating with other officers in solving the over-all employment problem. Discrimination which did not exist in the Selective Service System in the induction of men into the armed forces, will not be tolerated by General Hershey in meeting the problem of their reemployment when their term of military service has ended. The Honorable Paul V. McNutt, Chairman of the War Manpower Commission, employs many Negroes in the United States Employment Service offices throughout the country. All veterans applying to the public Employment Offices for job placement assistance will be given the maximum of service without regard to race, creed or color. More Negroes will be added to the personnel of these and other Government agencies as the work load increases.

I have heretofore spoken of the large number of Negroes who left the farm to enter the armed services - of the new skills which they had acquired - and of their understandable reluctance to return as farm laborers. Military service broadens the intellect as well as the shoulders. Veterns return with new ambitions and envision new horizons. They are filled with a desire to make greater contributions to the Nation. They desire also to provide for their dependents, some of the more abundant life of which many have heard so much and have tasted so little. One of the most prinitive instincts of man is the urge to own land. This opportunity is now available to the Negro farmer. The tenant farmer of yesterday may now become, with Government aid, a landowner as well as a land tiller, a landlord today, if you please, in place of the tenant of yesterday. This is a laudable ambition and one which is made possible by the "G. I. Bill," and you have the assurance of the Nation that the Negro will be given the same opportunity to fulfill this ambition as is given to every other veteran.

To the city dweller also, to the veteran who wishes to own his home, to a mechanic who wants to own a garage or a machine shop, to the erstwhile salesman or to the erstwhile clerk who would now be a merchant in his own right and in his own store, the Government offers the same opportunities through the provisions of that law.

To the veteran who seeks employment with a Government agency, to the widow of a deceased solder or sailor, and to the wife of those who are disabled, is given a preference in all federal employment. In fact, many jobs are, by law, set aside exclusively for veterans' employment.

For those who, in order to engage in business, desire to purchase surplus war property the Government is planning to give preference in purchase and loans and special considerstion in methods of payment for property purchased and repayment of loans made. The Nation's cup of gratitude is indeed overflowing.

Honesty and candor prevent a denial of the fact that the Negro has not always had a full opportunity to receive education commensurate with his ability to absorb and utilize advanced learning in scientific, commercial and professional pursuits. Your doctors, lawyers, scientists, artists and musicians, your representatives in every field of endeavor have demonstrated an unusual capacity to serve the Nation. Who can think of the miracle of Doctor George Washington Carver without contemplating the wealth of light and learning which lies dormant because of the lack of opportunity. Here again the "G. I. Bill" opens doors and books heretofore closed. High schools, colleges, laboratories, science, professions, the arts, learning for learning's sake alone, all lie within the grasp of the veteran, and if the future is to be judged by the past, it paints a picture of hopes to be realized and of long-denied ambition for many about to be fulfilled.

So far as the Government is concerned, so far as my official responsibilities are concerned in the administration of the laws which have been made for the benefit of all veterans, so far as employment for all veterans is concerned, there will be established and carried out "Four Freedoms". These freedoms are based upon programs which have already been adopted by many of your leaders in their consideration of the problem of Negro employment:

1. FREEDOM FROM DISCRIMINATION IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE LAW.

2. FREEDOM FROM INEQUALITY IN EDUCATION.

3. FREEDOM FROM INEQUALITY IN EXPENDITURES FOR HEALTH, HOSPITALIZATION AND REHABILITATION.

4. FREEDOM FROM OBSTACLES AND PREJUDICES WHICH PREVENT EQUAL WORK OPPORTUNITY AND EQUAL PAY.

I do not pretend that these freedoms are always easy to attain. Indeed, the present conflict proves that those rights to which we are often most entitled are the most difficult to attain. But in the administration of my responsibilities it shall be my continued official and personal policy to secure for all veterans, irrespective of race, color or creed, the full measure of right to which they are entitled by reason of the laws which Congress has written and by reason of the glorious pages of our history which the veteran himself has written.

VICTORY IN EUROPE - NEW PROBLEMS AT HOME

Memorandum on Programming to Meet Post-War Problems of Negro Workers and Veterans

The end of the war in Europe has precipitated a new set of problems to be faced by the Urban League movement. The implications, I am sure, are well known to all of us. While there will be variations in the extent to which the drastic changes in our national economy will affect each local community, the outstanding developments to be expected during the coming months may be listed as follows:

I. CUTBACKS OF 30% TO 40% IN WAR PRODUCTION

This estimate is based on reports recently released by the War Production Board. Shipbuilding, aircraft production, and munitions industries will experience sharp cutbacks in certain areas. Clothing, textiles, and a few other industries supplying essential materials for the armed forces will also be cut back substantially. Communications equipment, and radio production are scheduled for early revision of production schedules to meet reduced military requirements. Shifts in production schedules are now being planned to prevent extreme hardship in some one-industry towns and to continue in operation government-built plants. This procedure will release many industries from war contracts, thus permitting an early resumption of peace-time operations.

II. CUTBACKS OF 30% TO 40% IN THE WORK FORCE NOW ENGAGED IN WAR PRODUCTION

The estimated number of workers to be dropped from war industry payrolls within a year varies from 2½ to 3 million. Should Negro workers be released in proportion to their numbers in the labor force, it is expected that 300 to 400 thousand Negroes will be affected by the first post-war cutbacks. Further, since the majority of Negro war workers have found employment in congested war industry centers, many of these areas will have a disproportionate number of displaced Negro workers seeking employment in a saturated labor market.

Another important effect of the probable change in the tempo of war production will be the reduction in the work week in certain industries and the consequent cut in weekly earnings. The aircraft industry has already announced a plan to "downgrade" many workers and cut the work week to 40 or 44 hours. Other industries are expected to follow suit, despite vigorous objections from labor.

III. PARTIAL DEMOBILIZATION OF THE MILITARY

It is reliably estimated that approximately 2,000,000 men and women will be released from the armed forces during the next twelve months. It is very probable that the Army will discharge more than half of this total. If Negroes are discharged in the proportion that they bear to the total strength of the military (about 10%), we may expect the demobilization of 200,000 Negro service men. It is very probable that Negroes will not be released as quickly as white soldiers because of their concentration in Engineer, Quartermaster, Transport, and other non-combat units. These units are expected to remain in Europe for a much longer period. Under any circumstances, the number of veterans returning to civilian life will increase steadily during the months immediately ahead.

IV. DEVELOPMENT OF PROJECTS TO CUSHION TRANSITION PERIOD

Reports of progress in this direction are spotty and not at all impressive. It is estimated that projects now ready to move from the planning to the action stage will afford employment for approximately 1,000,000 workers within the next year. We may expect some rather feverish planning in some communities in order to get things started as soon as possible. Construction, road building, and street repairs will probably get the "green light" first. A serious lag in planning for housing development is said to exist in most communities.

V. RE-TOOLING AND RESUMPTION OF PRODUCTION OF CONSUMER COMMODITIES

Certain industries will lose little or no time in this operation, inasmuch as they will be producing the same products for consumer use. Automobiles, farm equipment, certain durable goods, and other metal work industries will require more time to re-tool and reconvert. Steel and heavy metals are not expected to be seriously affected, at least for several months. Chemicals will be reducing output within 30 to 60 days, it is reported.

VI. RELAXATION OF WAR-TIME CONTROLS ON HIRING PRACTICES

The FEPC and the WMC do not at present have authority to regulate hiring policies in converted or peace-time industries. While New York, New Jersey, and Indiana have enacted anti-discrimination legislation, prospects for early favorable action in other states are none too good. There is growing concern over the failure of Congress to consider legislation to create a permanent FEPC, at least during this session. Strong opposition has recently crystallized in the South as well as in other areas, and proponents of the bill are uncertain about the chances of getting favorable action on the bill now under consideration.

This brief appraisal of developments in the Urban League's areas of direct interest points up several problems on which we must be prepared to act. In the first place, it is likely that 500 to 600 thousand Negro workers and veterans will be changing jobs or looking for jobs. Displaced war workers will turn first to the local USES - a requirement for making application for unemployment benefits. Should they fail to get proper consideration, they will be making the rounds of all likely sources of information regarding jobs. Most of us will remember the days of the depression when the "regular visitors" could be expected every morning. Although local Leagues in the larger industrial centers will be partially prepared to handle the increased load, it is reasonable to anticipate a serious strain on the resources of practically all League offices. In the light of this possibility, it would seem advisable that several steps be taken to give the greatest possible assistance and counsel to these displaced workers:

1. As soon as possible, every League should prepare an estimate of the number of Negro workers to be affected by cutbacks in local industries.

   It is assumed that all local affiliates have access to information concerning employment in their communities. Classification of industries by products manufactured will provide a basis for determining the extent to which cutbacks may occur. Local CED committees, Chamber of Commerce Industrial Relations Departments, Post-War Planning Committees, and WMC offices will be collecting such information. This should not be a difficult job. In two communities (non-League cities), an energetic committee on post-war jobs has already organized a large committee made up of Negro workers in the major industries in the city. These key men are reporting regularly to the planning committee, on developments in the plants where they are employed. They are checking thoroughly all lay-off schedules, dismissals, plans for post-war employment, operation of seniority provisions in contracts, etc. Obviously, these two groups are on top of their problems, at least for the present.

2. Every local affiliate should begin now to tighten up machinery for careful policing of the performance of USES offices.

   Many Negro workers do not believe they will get a square deal in these offices. They have not forgotten the shabby treatment they received when the Defense Program started, and there isn't much evidence that the Service has improved materially. In Toledo, Newark, Cleveland, and a few other Urban League cities, committees have been formed (Urban League-USES) to see that the USES functions impartially. It is worth noting in this connection that local USES offices will increase personnel in anticipation of the post-war worker load. Veterans will receive service preferences and should be encouraged to qualify if they are eligible. Other qualified persons should take examinations for jobs that will be opening in the months ahead. WMC has already announced (unofficially) that 3,000 veterans will be employed for counselling, interviewing, and job-finding programs to be initiated within the next 30 days.

3. Many war workers have acquired single skills or experiences as simple machine operators. To find a market for the particular skill which they have developed during the war may not be easy. Consequently, there is much talk about refresher and supplementary training for dislocated workers. Any programming in this field should be planned with several factors in mind:

(a) Availability of training.
(b) Interest in further training.
(c) Possibility of securing training facilities, etc.

Obviously, this activity suggests an energetic program of group and individual counselling which can be undertaken by local affiliates having staff persons qualified to organize and develop the program. Local unions, educational institutions, and a number of industries are already planning programs to meet the needs of persons who must be re-trained.

4. It is very evident that the vast majority of Negro workers will have to be rehired. This simple fact brings into focus all of the factors that determine when, where and how they get jobs. Mention has already been made of the role of the USES in channeling workers. From such observations as we have been able to make, many industries are not planning to use the USES after the war, just as they declined to use it before the war. This means that Negro workers will be taking their chances at plant-hiring offices, along with thousands of other job-seekers. It means, also, that we should be prepared to get accurate information regarding the experiences of Negro workers in applying for jobs. In addition, we must be in a position to check this information with plant managers or personnel directors and effect such changes in hiring policies as will be necessary to insure proper consideration for Negro job-seekers.

It is already apparent that a number of unions will seek contract changes that will insure rehiring of their members first. In these instances, workers will be referred to employers from union hiring halls or by business agents or other representatives of the union.

Discrimination against Negro members can be practiced with reckless abandon unless the workers themselves are thoroughly acquainted with the procedure. This problem suggests some type of "off the record" relationship with Negro union workers to further acquaint them with the role of the union in placing workers. It suggests, also, a series of conferences and meetings with top union representatives to discuss union practices in this connection.

The building trades may be expected to revive much of their activity as the post-war construction program develops. Most of us recall the experiences of Negro construction workers during PWA days. The questions of union affiliation, veterans' preferences, etc., will be with us again. Local affiliates should review their experiences with building trades unions, renew their contacts with central labor councils, building trades councils, licensing bodies, and business agents of local unions. They should urge qualified Negro mechanics to re-establish their membership with their respective craft unions.

In this same connection, we may expect acceleration in the expansion of transportation and communications industries requiring additional workers trained as linemen, electrical construction workers, engineers, and other technicians. This work should be especially desirable to veterans with experience in the Signal Corps, Engineers, and other technical fields. Displaced war workers whose war-time experiences were obtained in the production of communications equipment and aircraft production may also qualify for this type of work.

Our further observation is that responsible employer groups do not mind discussing the post-war job problems of Negroes if they are properly informed about the situation. Profitable conferences have been held in several League cities on the problem, and top management has agreed to take an active part in seeing that Negroes are not turned away at their plant employment offices. The organization of such conferences is an excellent project for your industrial committee. The CED and other planning groups will be sponsoring similar conferences on the over-all local situation. They will always welcome a speaker who can discuss authoritatively the position of minority group workers. A recent conference of this nature in Newark was responsible for "highlighting" building trades union discrimination against Negro mechanics. This problem is now a hot issue, and we believe something will be done about it.

To summarize this analysis, we think it can be safely said that:

THE URBAN LEAGUE IS EXPECTED TO TAKE A POSITION OF UNQUESTIONED LEADERSHIP IN PRESENTING THE JOB PROBLEMS OF DISPLACED NEGRO WORKERS. WE MUST DEVELOP THE KIND OF ORGANIZATION STRATEGY THAT WILL EFFECTIVELY REACH MANAGEMENT, LABOR, THE GENERAL PUBLIC, PLANNING GROUPS, AND THE NEGRO WORKER. THIS IS A MUST ON OUR POST-WAR AGENDA!

Problems of the Negro Veteran

The provisions of the G. I. Bill of Rights should be well known to every League staff person in the United States. We shall not dwell upon them in this memorandum. The problems which we face where Negro veterans are concerned grow out of the administration and implementation of the bill. The specific questions we must be prepared to answer are:

1. Will Negro veterans get maximum service from established agencies such as the Veterans Administration, the Veterans' Employment Division of the USES, etc.?

2. Will Negro veterans get equitable consideration when applying for jobs in these and other agencies (government) which will be employing veterans during the coming months?

3. Will local unions give impartial consideration to Negro veterans who will be eligible for membership under special conditions adopted by organized labor?

4. Will local business and industrial establishments employ Negro veterans as apprentices under the provisions of the G. I. Bill?

5. Will Negro veterans get their "old jobs" back under the recent interpretation released by the War Department? Are local draft boards assisting Negro veterans in this respect?

6. Is there an organization or agency equipped to give Negro veterans sound information about loans for business purposes, loans for home purchases, etc.?

7. What organization or agency is prepared to counsel Negro veterans about returning to schools or colleges which offer special interest courses? (To date the majority of Negro colleges have done very little on this question, particularly in expanding offerings in technical or professional work. By no means are we depending upon them to absorb an estimated 50,000 Negro veterans who will be eligible for college or other educational work under the provisions of the G. I. Bill.)

   A related problem grows out of the inadequacy of secondary schools in most communities. What steps have been taken to expand offerings that will attract Negro veterans who may wish to pursue special work in a specific field?

8. Is the Veterans' Information Center equipped to give proper guidance and advice to Negro veterans? Are Negroes employed on the staff? Are Negro volunteers used as counsellors? Do Negro veterans have confidence in the Center? These questions can be answered only by careful inquiry and policing, but every local League should know exactly what the score is.

9. How much of a veterans' load can the League carry? The chances are that many veterans will turn to the League when other agencies fail to serve them satisfactorily. Are we prepared to give them the kind of help they need? Do we have a staff member qualified to do this job, or can we recruit volunteers to supplement League staff?

10. What are the attitudes and practices of veterans' organizations in the local community? Has the American Legion assumed any responsibility for protecting the interests of Negro members and veterans? Have local Negro Posts been encouraged to become more articulate and interested in what's going on around them?

These questions immediately suggest areas of operation for every local League. Of course, we can not undertake all of the jobs to be done, but an important part of the League program is geared around community organization designed to improve the economic well-being of Negro people. Our correspondence on these questions indicates that several affiliates have already moved in on some aspects of the program. Undoubtedly, all of us will be called upon to function vigorously when the crisis comes. In preparation for this job, we should know every person responsible for the administration of a local, state, and area Veterans' Service in our immediate vicinity. We should be prepared to get information about the experiences of Negro veterans in their contacts with these agencies as a basis for realistic programming. This is a big order, but, after all, THE URBAN LEAGUE IS ACCUSTOMED TO BIG ORDERS!

National Office Plans and Programs

The National Office is keenly conscious of its responsibility and obligations to do an effective job during the months ahead. Articulation of National and local programs is, therefore, of great importance and should be a matter of immediate concern to every affiliate. At the moment, we are concentrating our activities around the following objectives:

Role of Government

Interpretation of the problems and needs of Negro war workers and veterans to appropriate government and private agencies. In this connection, we have established satisfactory relationships with the National Offices of the Veterans Administration, the Selective Service Office, the Veterans' Employment Division of the War Manpower Commission, the War Production Board, the Civil Service Commission, the Department of Commerce, and the Department of Agriculture.

We are preparing memoranda to be sent to General Frank T. Hines, Paul McNutt, Henry Wallace, General Lewis B. Hershey, and other Government officials. In this memoranda, we shall define and analyze the problem as we see it and suggest such administrative policies and practices as will insure proper implementation of the G. I. Bill and other legislation. We are requesting conferences with each of these officials for full discussion of the recommendations. We may mention several recent developments which have grown out of previous discussions:

(a) The Selective Service System has assigned 6 Negro officers as specialists in job finding for Negro veterans. They will work closely with Veterans' Placement officers in the several states. The plan is to assign an officer to each industrial state. We are working out details for close cooperation between League offices and the Veterans' Placement Officer in the states to which they have already been assigned.

(b) The Veterans Administration has appointed a contact representative, adjudicator, and loan advisor (all Negroes) in the Boston area through efforts of the regional office of the WMC. We have written all regional WMC Minority Group Specialists, asking them to secure similar appointments. Dick Walker of Region I is holding conferences with regional representatives in other regions to assist in getting similar action. Larry Duncan, Sidney Williams, and Dick Walker have already discussed the situation in Region V. Bill Smith in Region III has reported substantial progress in Philadelphia.

(c) We are scheduling conferences with Robert C. Goodwin, Executive Director of the WMC, and General Hines for next week to review the entire national picture and to discuss personnel for several key jobs that should be filled.

Working With Management

We are strengthening our contacts with large industries. Many well known corporations have endorsed and supported the United Urban League Service Fund. Our contacts have been established with vice presidents in charge of industrial relations, and we expect to discuss post-war employment prospects with them as soon as the campaign is over. For your information, we are mentioning a few of those corporations:

American Telephone & Telegraph
Standard Oil
Western Electric
Bethlehem Steel
National Supply
Westinghouse Electric & Mfg.
General Motors
Sperry Corporation Shell Oil
Curtiss-Wright
General Electric
Radio Corporation of America
United States Rubber
Goodyear Rubber
Doehler Die Casting
Allis-Chalmers
DuPont Company

We hope to get clear-cut statements of policy from top management and proper implementation of policy in all branch or subsidiary plants. We can then channel these contacts to both the local League and the local plant in the community. This is one of the very helpful results of the financial campaign which we intend to follow up.

Working With Labor — We have been fortunate in getting excellent sponsorship and endorsement of the financial campaign from top labor leadership as well as from rank and file union officers. We plan to follow up this relationship with labor just as we are with industry. We shall schedule conferences with top leadership in the AFofL and the CIO as soon as this phase of the campaign is completed.

Public Relations — We are intensifying our entire public relations program. The Industrial Relations News Letter will be issued monthly. The second report of the Industrial Relations Laboratory will be published after the campaign. We are moving now to get feature stories and articles in industrial and business journals as well as in other publications. Civic groups and interracial committees all over the country are requesting information and discussion leaders on the problems of reconversion. We have more requests of this nature than we can fill.

The Industrial Relations News Letter has received wide approval, and we may have to prepare as many as 5,000 copies each month. Industrial firms, personnel and management organizations are requesting them by the scores.

Southern Picture — In the South a number of colleges are sponsoring conferences on post-war problems, and we have been invited to serve as consultants and discussion leaders. One such conference was held recently at Dillard University, and one has been planned at Hampton Institute for the middle of June. We are going to take the initiative in organizing similar conferences in other areas. The Director of the Southern Field Division is working out an extensive program for the fall, and we will cooperate fully with his plans.

Field Service — We are initiating an expanded field service to local affiliates and in the Southern cities early in the fall. To be most effective, the field visits must be carefully planned around a few specific objectives. They will be properly scheduled in order to save time and travel expense. More about this later.

Information to Affiliates — We will continue to send pertinent information released by Government and private planning organizations to be used in planning and implementing local programs. Meanwhile, we must have important information regarding local developments in order to be most helpful with problems which are bound to arise in the coming months. In this connection, we are discussing the possibilities for another series of releases similar to the series carried by the CHICAGO DEFENDER two years ago. The title will probably be: "How V-E Day Affected Our City".

CONCLUSION

The conclusion to this analysis of our post-war responsibility can be stated in these final remarks. The Urban League, nationally and locally, is the best equipped, best informed agency in America on the job problems of Negro workers. In 35 years, we have accumulated a wealth of experience and "know-how" which has not been utilized to its fullest extent. Organized labor, industrial management, and the general public have a better knowledge of our objectives and methods than ever before. At the same time, the problem of full employment has become a major concern of many organizations, and the Negro workers' job problems are recognized as an important aspect of the over-all problem. The next few years will, therefore, be "crucial" for the Urban League. We must make the most of them!

LABOR RELATIONS BULLETIN

An Informational Service for Labor Unions

Nat'l Urban League

Published by the Chicago Urban League, 3032 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago 16, August, 1945

LITTLE WORLD, WHAT NOW?

The war in the Pacific has ended. Once more, our shaken world looks toward peace. But many baffling problems loom ahead before this dream of peace can become a reality.

Statesmen will struggle to put into effect the principles of international cooperation formulated by the United Nations security council.

Can we leave it to them - this task of insuring security?

Can we, the people, wash our hands of the entire matter - go about our everyday business confident that the peacemakers will evolve a formula for security and that we need play no role besides that of the onlooker?

Progressive citizens - and that means labor leaders, of course - know that we cannot. They know that no formula for world security is more than a myth unless security is assured for the individual worker - the right to a job commensurate with his abilities, at a wage that will enable him to support himself and his family at a decent standard of living.

Labor's victory in the recent British election is concrete evidence that the people of that nation are placing their faith in progressive leadership.

Here in America, encouraged by the turn of events in Britain, labor is continuing its efforts to make its voice felt in shaping the nation's policies.

American labor leaders know that the victory over foreign fascists will be an empty one if the forces of intolerance - playing upon distinctions of race, religion, and national background - continue to divide the workers and blind them to their common interests.

CARRYING OUT THOSE POST-WAR PLANS

Realizing all this, it is not surprising that the problem of the Negro worker is high on the list of considerations for the post-war plans of labor leaders.

Quite naturally, the men and women who guide the destinies of the labor movement are concerned with problems that reach to the very heart of economic security. Such a problem is that of the Negro worker.

The war years have brought hundreds of thousands of new Negro workers into the great industries of our country. For the first time these workers have been in a position to join the labor movement and to share in its benefits. Many white people, in turn, through work contacts have for the first time really learned to know their colored neighbors and to judge them as individuals rather than as a racial group.

Now that the war is over and the high level of employment is rapidly decreasing, labor leaders must recognize the dangers of losing these gains.

As production drops and workers are released from their jobs, they know, the Negro will suffer disproportionately. And so, along with the struggle for full employment, labor is especially diligent in using its influence to work toward the full and complete integration of Negroes into the union movement.

A BASIC APPROACH - THE WORKERS COUNCILS

To carry out this objective most effectively, a thorough understanding of the background of the Negro worker is essential. Those who have an opportunity would do well to study the exhaustive analysis of the racial problem made by Gunnar Myrdal and his associates for the Carnegie Foundation. The two-volume study, An American Dilemma: The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy, contains an excellent chapter on the Negro's role in the labor movement.

In this bulletin, however, we shall rely on the presentations of the Workers Bureau of the National Urban League, which has been concerned with these problems ever since the early days of the depression.

Through its Workers Councils the bureau has been studying the basic questions involved in the Negro worker's relationship to the labor movement. It has been concerned on the one hand with the attitudes of labor unions and their members toward Negroes; on the other hand, with the Negro's point of view toward the labor movement.

The program was launched in the midst of the depression era. It was highly essential, the League believed, that the people understand the basic causes of the depression which was so greatly affecting their lives. Especially was the League concerned with interpreting to Negroes the reason for their disproportionate suffering - and the one outstanding remedy for such a condition - the full participation of Negroes in the labor movement.

CONSIDER THESE FACTS

To accomplish this end, the League published a series of pamphlets directing the attention of the workers to some very important considerations.

For example:

Negroes were losing jobs two or three times as fast as whites - with little or no opportunity to find work again.

In October 1933 - 2,117,000 Negroes were on relief!
By January 1935 - 3,300,000 Negroes were on relief!

The Negro's lack of participation in the union movement left him virtually without leadership or protection.

Three out of every 100 Negroes belonged to labor unions.
The other 97 were left to fend for themselves as best they could.
In an overflooded labor market with no effective controls over job discrimination, they were at the mercy of the employers, the majority of whom overlooked them for a more "desirable" group of workers.

The Negro remained outside of the union movement largely for two reasons:

Many unions would not admit Negroes.
Negroes worked mainly in occupations that were not well organized - in agriculture, unskilled labor, and domestic service.

Without the benefit of organization to protect their rights, Negroes were completely overlooked in the NRA codes and received little protection under the Labor Relations Act or the National Recovery Act.

Over 75 per cent of Negro workers were ineligible for unemployment insurance under the provisions of the social security act - and this only 10 years ago!

The only "way out" for the Negro - the only force that could help him to escape from suffering a disproportionate share of the evils of the depression - was organized action.

He must wage an unrelenting fight for full participation in the labor movement!

Logical though it was, the realization that organized labor was his salvation came slowly to the Negro. His background of unemployment and despair had embittered him. Seeing organized white workers get the jobs, while he was left unemployed, he too often allowed his frustrations to overcome appeals to his intelligence. He blamed the unions for his plight instead of seeing in them his solution.

In this background lies the explanation of the traditional attitude of Negro workers regarding labor unions. Through the efforts of such organizations as the Workers Bureau, much progress has been made in breaking down this attitude. Yet it is still prevalent among many Negroes. The facts are well known to labor leaders; but they deserve to be re-emphasized, for in them rests the key to the present situation.

LESSONS OF THE PAST

The past has other lessons, too, for labor leaders, as the Workers Bureau pointed out.

Two hundred years of bitter economic competition between white and Negro workers could not fail to leave its scars. Many analysts believe that much of the bitter feeling still existing in the South is a carry-over from slavery days, when free white men went jobless and hungry while black slaves had work and bread.

And in the North, it was the desperate rivalry of the foreign-born whites and Negroes, fighting for the same jobs, that led first to tensions and then to the riots of the war years - as witness Detroit on June 20, 1943.

THE PARADOX OF PREJUDICE

Such racial conflict is not only tragic for the Negro but is disastrous for the white worker as well. He may believe he is increasing his own security when he tries to bar Negroes from a union or refuses to work with them. Yet, paradoxically, he is only destroying his security. His attitude encourages the formation of a dangerous supply of underpaid, unorganized Negro labor which regards unionism as an enemy.

Every ninth worker in the United States is a Negro. When eight whites combine to exclude the ninth worker from union protection, from better paid jobs in prosperous times and from any jobs at all in depression periods - then all nine are the losers. Penniless and hungry, the unorganized and unemployed worker is willing to work at any wage under any conditions. Inevitably he becomes a threat to the security of every employed worker.

UNITED FOR THE FUTURE

Shortsighted leadership in the labor movement forced Negroes into this position for fifty years. Fortunately that time is past. Since the depression, more enlightened leadership has recognized the dangers of racial division in the ranks of labor and has fought persistently against discrimination. Under such leadership - and the leaders are of all racial groups - hundreds of thousands of Negroes have been brought into the labor movement in the last decade.

In the war years, millions of black and white people have worked together - have learned more about one another, have lost their long-standing prejudices based on ignorance and misunderstanding. They have come to realize that, regardless of the record of the past, they share a common struggle and a common destiny.

The war with its emphasis on the need for joint participation in the defense of our country undoubtedly deserves major credit for effecting this change. Yet the groundwork had been laid by the National Urban League. It was the League which had impressed on the Negro the fact that he must win his way into the house of organized labor, and given him the assurance that many white workers, once they had an opportunity to do so, would join with him in reaching this goal.

THE PEOPLE VS. DISCRIMINATION

The problems of 1936 might well serve as an indication of the problems of 1946 and the years to come. There is, however, this advantage - during the last decade Negro and white workers have learned to pull together to give every worker a share in the opportunity that is rightly his.

In facing the future, forward-looking leaders recognize the imperative need for bringing even more Negro workers into full participation in the labor movement. Furthermore, with the prospect of greater cutbacks during reconversion and enemployment in the post-war years, they are preparing to meet the scramble for jobs which is likely to result in ill feeling and racial friction.

Thus labor leaders will insist upon union members making a concerted effort against any development of the dog-eat-dog philosophy of the depression years. In case of widespread unemployment, labor leaders must insist on the right of every person to an equal opportunity for work, regardless of color.

These questions, of course, all involve such serious problems as reconversion, full employment, adequate unemployment compensation, and perhaps public works. If labor's gains are to be preserved, these are problems that must be tackled with courage by all progressive labor leaders.

Labor has indicated its recognition of these basic issues by its active work on behalf of fair employment legislation. However, it is extremely important not only that the leaders themselves understand and work for these objectives, but that the rank and file union members take up the fight for an effective democracy.

LABOR RELATIONS BULLETIN

An Informational Service for Labor Unions

Natl Urban League

Published by the Chicago Urban League, 3032 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago 16, October 1945

Three short stories will be presented in this bulletin. They're true accounts of situations on the labor front, showing how three different unions - all affiliated with the same large group - have met the problem of race prejudice.

Each of them has a moral, and each must be interpreted in the light of the war's end and the present period of uncertainty about employment.

A PARADOX

On the West Side of Chicago, a huge manufacturing plant opened its doors to Negroes. This company held a closed shop contract with a union which up until the war period had prevented the management from employing Negro workers. The demand for war workers forced the union to concede that Negroes be employed for specific war production jobs. However, instead of strengthening its position and prestige by welcoming the newcomers, the union granted them only "working permits" and refused to allow them to attend meetings or exercise any of the privileges of members. Moreover, an agreement was made with management that when the war work ended, all these new workers - whether white or Negro - were to be laid off.

With the end of the war, the company proceeded to make heavy reductions in its working force. The majority of the new workers, both Negroes and whites, hired during the war had to be dismissed. Among the group, however, were several exceptional workers - seven of whom happened to be Negroes. These workers remained on the job finishing the necessary items in the war contracts. Before they had completed this task the company was back in peacetime production, and management found other capacities in which these especially competent workers could be used permanently.

But when management made this suggestion, the union officials objected - to the seven Negroes. No question was raised about retaining the white workers who had proven especially competent. When the matter of keeping on the Negro workers arose, however, the union conveniently recalled that it had a closed shop contract with the company.

MANAGEMENT REPORTS DISCRIMINATION

Here, indeed, was a paradox. The union - the worker's friend - in this case was actively engaged in opposing the interests of the Negro workers.

Management - too often at odds with the working man - in this case took action to protest against such injustice. It was through management that the Urban League heard about the discrimination on the part of the union.

The President's Committee on Fair Employment Practices and several other agencies had made many efforts to persuade local and international officials of this union to set aside their barriers against Negro workers. Thus the union had become well aware of the problems involved before the Urban League entered the picture.

The Urban League investigated management's charges and found them true. Then we conferred with the union officials. They admitted there was no valid reason why the Negro workers should not be retained on the job and allowed to become union members - no reason at all except the prejudices of the rank and file union members.

Fortunately, we were able to convince these union leaders that if they themselves took a strong stand in favor of equal privileges for Negroes, their members would accept them, too. The officials finally worked out an agreement with the company whereby the Negroes were to be retained.

"FOR WHITES ONLY"

This is not the only example in the Chicago area of a union which discriminated against Negroes while the company pursued a fair-minded policy.

At a neighboring firm, another union in the same group as the one cited above held a closed shop contract. A large number of Negroes was added to the working force during the war period. These new workers were ignored - no effort was made to welcome them into the union. This only cemented the too prevalent feeling that unions were "for whites only."

Meanwhile, with the considerable increase in non-union members among the employees, management observed that the union was losing its majority. Management began to take the attitude that the union's position was becoming so weak there was no need to worry about renewing the contract.

Belatedly, the union became concerned about the Negro workers. At first it reacted with hostility. Hadn't the union's position been strong until the Negro workers appeared to weaken its majority? Instead of realizing where the responsibility lay, it blamed the Negroes.

In spite of this feeling of antagonism, the union was forced to recognize the fact that at least some of the Negro workers must be unionized if labor was to retain any power whatever in the company. And so, in the midst of a tense situation, with feeling running high between the white and Negro workers, the union had to begin a campaign to enlist the support of the Negroes. It is still carrying on this campaign, trying to make up for lost time in an effort to renew its dwindling power.

BY WAY OF CONTRAST

On the positive side we can present the story of a third union, affiliated with the same group as the other two, which has had a good record in integrating Negroes during the war.

Early in the war period, this union took stock of its record and made plans to remedy its past defects - its exclusion of certain minority groups. As Negroes joined the production lines, it immediately welcomed them and took steps to bring them into the union. Not only did the Negroes join, but several were elected to office.

At present there are two Negroes on the executive committee of this union - a significant achievement in an organization which five years ago had not a single Negro member.

Vigorous objections had been voiced by the membership when the question of Negro membership first arose. But through the efforts of the leaders, a policy of non-discrimination was adopted and new members were clearly informed of this policy.

Here is an example of a union which has been quite successful both in obtaining Negro members and in carrying out its anti-discriminatory policy - because it recognized early enough the importance of such a policy.

This union draws its membership from plants which were operating nearly 100 per cent on war contracts. With the end of the war, there was bound to be a great reduction in the working force. The only fair policy - and the one which would in the long run prove to be to the interests of the members - was to open its privileges to all workers, regardless of racial or national origin.

THE MORALS?

Perhaps they're obvious - but they may well be reinforced by an interpretation.

"THE EVIL THAT MEN DO. . ."

The evil deeds that men do are remembered. And so it is with unions. Of the three situations described, it is the first two which have received publicity in the Negro community. The fact that a third union has a good record with regard to the Negro worker is completely overlooked in the face of these other, inflammatory incidents.

The seven Negroes in the first story who feared that the prejudices of union members would deprive them of their jobs despite their excellent records could hardly be expected not to explain the circumstances to their friends. During the war when Negroes were going to work in the plant with the permission of the union, even though they were denied the opportunity to attend union meetings, they and their friends could at least hope that democracy might find its way into this union.

However, when the war ended, their hopes were dashed with the union's insistence that both employment and union privileges should be "for whites only." True, later on the union revised its policy - but the damage had been done, and could not be wiped out by a mere reversal of position. It will take much time and effort to undo that damage.

Likewise, the ostracized Negroes in the second story did not keep to themselves their suspicions about the white union members. Ignored at first, they could not be too sure of the union's sincerity when it finally made a belated effort to win their favor.

Both instances fomented a wave of suspicion, resentment, and distrust of unions in the Negro community which will only encourage race antagonisms Thus a few carelessly considered acts on the part of unions can easily aggravate all the old hostilities of Negroes and serve to widen the gap between white and Negro workers.

"A STITCH IN TIME. . ."

How much wiser in the long run was the policy of the third union! Its "stitch in time" - its policy, adopted early in the war period, of opening its ranks to all workers on a basis of equality - has had the happy result of cementing friendly relationships among the workers of various racial and nationality groups.

Now, when less fortunate unions face the problem of overcoming such antagonisms at a time when labor's position is precarious and union cohesion is essential, it does not have these additional worries. As cutbacks occur and some workers inevitably lose their jobs, this union will guard against the entrance of race discrimination into the picture. Thus it is doing its part in assuring the Negro worker that organized labor can be his friend.

"A HOUSE DIVIDED AGAINST ITSELF. . ."

Even more important than the preceding considerations, however, is the role of race discrimination in further widening the distance between the great groups of labor.

All three of the unions cited here are affiliated with the same labor group. Since acts of discrimination gain wider publicity than do fair policies, the entire labor group with which these unions are associated will receive criticism as being unfair to Negro workers. The fascist-minded, watchful for any evidence of dissension in the ranks of labor, will seize on such a situation and exploit it for all it is worth. Thus will they kill two birds with one stone - they will incite racial strife and will promote further disunity in the labor movement.

It is indeed unfortunate when certain unions give the opponents of labor a talking point by their own acts of discrimination against segments of the working group who happen to be racial minorities.

What To Do About It?

What can other unions do to counteract the damage that has been done by such acts of discrimination as those described above?

Any union that still retains a vestige of racial discrimination, either in principle or in practice, should adopt a general policy stating that such discrimination is highly inimical to the best interests of labor. And then - be vigilant in carrying out that policy.

In our changing society, no group can continue simply to regard incidents of discrimination as "unfortunate," expressing the pious hope that "time" will bring a solution.

Time cannot bring any solution for which we ourselves are not responsible. In a world clamoring for democracy, either the labor movement must make its claims of democracy into more than mere words or it must face destruction.

THE NEGRO VETERAN RETURNS

They are coming home by the thousands to Wylie Avenue in Pittsburgh, Lenox Avenue in New York, Walnut Street in Louisville, and to hundreds of other cities and villages. Fresh new service stripes and bright-colored service ribbons tell their part in World War II. Honorable discharge buttons remind us that these men served well.

On V-J Day, more than a million Negro men and women had been inducted into the armed forces. Half saw foreign service. They followed the flag in every theatre of war from Iceland to Australia, from Alaska to Africa. They fought and worked in the China-Burma-India theatre and the Middle East, in England, France, Italy, and the South Pacific. They helped to hasten the day of victory.

Assignment Without Glamor

The exploits of their service units seldom made the headlines. Engineer units fought disease and tropical heat in the Central Pacific where they created bomber bases and runways in record time. They built B-29 bases deep in the wastes of India, and they fashioned ports, docks, bridges, and highways in remote islands and outposts in every battle area. Quartermaster and transport units kept supplies rolling up to the front line, despite machine gun and artillery fire. A signal corps unit installed and maintained thousands of miles of wire and cable during their four months in Italy. Another unit, in England, handled wire communications for the invasion forces. Maybe there wasn't much glamor in some of these jobs, but General Dwight D. Eisenhower thought enough of one truck company's service in the invasion of France to say: "I want you to know that I appreciate your splendid work. Your accomplishments are a source of gratification to me and to your Army Commander."

They Were Fighters, Too!

TIME's correspondent, Robert Martin, cabled this story (TIME—May 29, 1944): "In the Bougainville jungles, white and colored troops live together in soldierly understanding. Units of the 93rd Division, first all-Negro infantry division to be sent overseas in this war, had fought and acquitted themselves with honor . . ."

In November 1943, it was announced that "Negro troops of Uncle Sam's fighting forces were winning their spurs in the battle for Italy. They were right up in front when Lt. General Mark W. Clark's Fifth Army over-ran the toe of the Italian Boot and fanned out in the direction of Rome."

Then in December 1943, the 450th Anti-Aircraft Artillery Automatic Weapons Battalion, the first Negro combat force to land on European soil, was cited by Lt. General Clark when he declared: " I am proud of the outstanding performance of duty of these soldiers in this baptism of fire. Their conduct was excellent and reflects the training and discipline of their units."

In the air corps, Negro pilots of the 99th Squadron, led by Colonel Benjamin O. Davis, Jr., slugged it out with Nazi planes in the battle of Italy. General Henry H. Arnold reported to the War Department: "The results of the 99th Fighter Squadron during the past two weeks, particularly since the Nettuno landing, are very commendable. My best wishes for their continued success." In the summer of 1944, the 332d Fighter Group, successor to the 99th Squadron, shot down five German planes in a single day's action with the 15th Air Force, escorting heavy bombers in the Munich area.

These are only a few examples of the performance of Negro servicemen. In every theatre and in every phase of the war, they demonstrated resourcefulness, efficiency, and bravery.

Heroes Today — But What of Tomorrow?

Every thoughtful American agrees that our veterans should get all possible assistance as they return to civilian life. The veterans themselves want to forget the war as soon as they can. They want to get back to work—useful and productive work that pays a living wage, challenging work that gives promise of bettering the nation's standard of living.

For Negro veterans, the job is all important. Before the war they had a tough struggle as wage-earners. Ten years of pre-war depression, coupled with a stubborn reluctance to hire Negroes in the early days of the defense program, deprived many Negro young people of the chance to discover their latent talents and abilities. Then, too, almost a third of all Negro servicemen came from rural areas in the South where educational and employment opportunities were extremely limited. A vast number of these men received special training in the armed forces and are now ready to hold civilian skilled jobs for the first time.

He Is Better Trained

Hundreds of veterans learned cooking and baking in Army and Navy schools. Radio and electronics were mastered by scores of men in signal and communications units. Thousands of veterans in mechanized units learned how to repair and service all kinds of motor equipment and motors. Engineer and construction units were taught to build the roads, landing fields, bridges, and docks required to keep the Army moving. Machinists, chemists, engineers, clerks, and specialists of all kinds will be found among the men who served in the various supply and maintenance branches of the Army and Navy.

He Is Better Disciplined

The Negro veteran learned teamwork and cooperation as a part of his overall training. He was taught to accept his responsibility and to look at his job in relation to a larger objective. He knows what is meant by "morale" and "production." The "sloppy, indifferent, ambitionless" youngster stereotyped by legend and tradition is now more of a myth than ever. The veteran has had the feel of a dynamic organization, and this experience has prepared him for a new role in the American economy.

What Are the Negro Veterans' Job Prospects?

The whole point of this Newsletter can be summed up in this question: How shall we now utilize the skills and capacities with which we have equipped some 1,000,000 Negro youths?

First reports are that Negro veterans are not getting available jobs for which they are qualified. Too many employers are looking at the so-called "race problem" and ignoring what the skilled Negro veteran can offer. Apprenticeship opportunities are practically non-existent for Negro veterans whose war-time training fits them for productive work. Some labor unions are guilty of bias and discrimination. And many government officials in agencies serving veterans are fumbling helplessly with the job problems of men who ask only an equal chance to prove their worth. The inevitable result is that Negro veterans will become bitter and frustrated as they trudge from office to office and factory to factory in search of employment.

Some Employers Are Concerned

It should not be said that all employers are indifferent to the Negro veteran's job problems. In our discussions with representatives of management, we have noted that many of them are intensely interested in this situation. Among the specific commitments we have been able to secure we consider the following unusually significant:

1. An official of a large public utility said: "This company plans to use the skills of veterans without regard to race or color. We are carefully reviewing the qualifications of Negro veterans applying for employment. The union has agreed to go along 100% in our plans."

2. A construction company executive who was an officer in an engineer unit in the South Pacific observed: "I see no reason why this company cannot cooperate fully in providing jobs for Negro veterans. There were Negro soldiers in my regiment, and they did a swell job under terrific pressure. They'll get a fair share of work with us."

3. A department store executive, back on his job after months of Army service, said his company would employ Negro veterans in any jobs for which they could qualify. The company has recently initiated a program of upgrading Negro workers to clerical and sales jobs.

4. The personnel officer of a concern manufacturing electrical equipment has employed Negro veterans with training in electrical wiring and installation. The company's production schedules will require many more workers with skills in this field.

5. A trucking company, engaged in inter-state transportation, has agreed to employ Negro drivers, preferably those with experience in Army transport service.

6. A large company, specializing in the repair of adding machines, typewriters, and other equipment, has employed Negro veterans with machine shop training.

7. A nationally known merchandising establishment has employed and trained Negro veterans to fill jobs as junior executives.

8. A prominent manufacturer of farm implements has indicated that Negro veterans with mechanical training will be employed in all of its plants.

To the growing list of progressive employers now being contacted by Urban League representatives in 53 cities, we must add many more firms before the majority of Negro veterans can be absorbed in the labor force. Other agencies, including the Veterans Administration and the Veterans' Employment Division of the USES, are seeking jobs for Negro veterans. As we move toward our goal of full production and full employment, we want to remind our readers that Negro veterans are prepared to make an important contribution to the fulfillment of this objective. All they ask is a fair chance.

ADJUSTMENT OF NEGRO VETERANS

by

Julius A. Thomas, Director
Department of Industrial Relations
National Urban League

This report of the experiences of Negro veterans and the organization of services has been prepared by the National Urban League to assist Negro veterans in making an orderly and speedy adjustment to civilian life. It points out the areas in which gaps will be found in the present program, and suggests steps that should be taken to correct obvious inadequacies in the program.

In presenting this report, it should be noted that in some communities a sincere effort is being made to give Negro veterans maximum assistance in making plans for their future as civilians. In most of the Northern, Eastern, and Middle Western cities included in this inquiry, Negro personnel has been added to the staffs of Veterans' Contact Offices and the United States Employment Service Offices. Many of the special problems noted in these areas stem from the unsettled condition of the labor market, as well as from a lack of knowledge of information needed to counsel Negro veterans wisely.

It should be noted, also, that officials of the Veterans Administration and representatives of the United States Employment Service have generally been frank in discussing the problems which the Negro veteran presents. In almost every instance, these officials have expressed a desire to improve the services they are expected to give and are anxious to discover techniques and methods that will be most useful in accomplishing this objective. The recommendations submitted for the consideration of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and officials of other agencies serving veterans have been made with the view of strengthening and extending services now available to thousands of Negro veterans.

The report covers the cities named in this memorandum. A local affiliate or Service Council of the National Urban League will be found in each of them. Members of the National staff of the Urban League have made field visits in many of these cities to check on reports submitted by local staff, and community leaders, and to discuss some of the problems with officials of the Veterans Administration, the Veterans' Employment Division of the United States Employment Service, and voluntary civic and social welfare agencies in the cities named.

Employment and Training

The major problems confronting Negro veterans in the majority of cities studied in this inquiry have to do with employment, training, and counseling. In all of the larger cities, the movement of Negro veterans into peace-time employment lags far behind the movement of white veterans, although both groups are experiencing many disappointing difficulties in their efforts to find suitable employment. Negro veterans seeking assistance through the Veterans' Employment Service express a lack of confidence in this agency's efforts to secure employment for them, particularly in jobs other than the traditional Negro jobs. Many veterans have declined to accept jobs which paid wages below the unemployment allowances granted them under the G. I. Bill of Rights and have applied for unemployment compensation. In some cities, Negro veterans constitute 50% of the total Negro registration in active USES files.

On-the-job training and apprenticeship opportunities are rarely available to Negro veterans in Northern or Southern cities. In a few Northern cities, Negro veterans have been accepted as apprentices in the building trades, but the number has been almost insignificant. For instance, in St. Louis, Missouri, Negro veterans are excluded from any apprenticeship training in the building trades, while in Memphis, Tennessee, 40 Negro veterans were apprenticed by a segregated carpenters' union. We were unable to find any well-organized effort to secure on-the-job training or apprenticeship training for Negro veterans in any city.

The situation with respect to vocational training was found to be most disheartening. In only 11 of the 50 cities studied by the Urban League were Negroes able to get anything approaching adequate formal vocational or technical training. In most instances, the schools accepting veterans were already overcrowded, and there was a waiting list of 50 to 300 Negro veterans. In all but 2 cities having segregated school systems, the training available to Negro veterans was entirely inadequate. The exceptions were Baltimore, Maryland; and Washington, D.C. In cities with bi-racial school systems, Negro veterans were restricted to the industrial arts departments of the Negro high schools. These schools are designed to give Negro youth exploratory training in vocational fields and are not equipped or staffed to offer realistic training in specific fields. In one large border city, St. Louis, Missouri, Negro veterans are being enrolled in the same classes with high school boys, and in another, Richmond, Virginia, even this privilege is not accorded Negro veterans.

A study of the vocational interests of 1,000 Negro veterans revealed that all separate schools are extremely weak in the training most frequently desired by the veterans. The inquiry showed that these veterans wanted training in radio and electrical work, machine shop and mechanics, business training, carpentry and woodwork, and commercial photography.

Veteran Enrollment in Colleges

The number of Negro veterans enrolling in Negro colleges and industrial schools has been steadily increasing, but it has not kept pace with the total veteran enrollment. In 30 colleges from which information was obtained, there were 3,351 Negro veterans out of a total enrollment of 19,311 students. The total veteran enrollment in 10 colleges offering technical and vocational training was 1,763. All of these schools reported a sizeable waiting list which could not be immediately admitted because of overcrowding and lack of housing.

The following table shows the number of veterans enrolled in 10 Negro colleges offering vocational and technical education:

College	Total Enrollment	Veterans Enrollment
A. and T. College	1,382	244
Albany (Ga.) State College	309	[illegible]
Fort Valley State College	382	23
Hampton Institute	1,070	[illegible]
Langston University	540	[illegible]
Prairie View State College	1,337	[illegible]
Tennessee A. and I. State College	1,491	167
Tuskegee Institute	1,613	422
West Virginia State College	992	224
Wilberforce University	1,005	90
TOTAL	10,121	1,763

Negro Personnel in Agencies Serving Veterans

In almost every large city in the country, the number of Negroes employed by the Veterans Administration and the United States Employment Service was extremely limited. In the Southern cities, no Negroes were found on the staff of the Veterans Administration, except in the Negro colleges which have been designated as rehabilitation and counseling centers. In Tennessee, for example, only 4 Negroes are employed by the Veterans Administration, although 35% of all men entering the service from that state were Negroes. In Louisiana, the Veterans Administration has employed 600 persons, of whom only 4 are Negroes. Negro inductions from Louisiana were 38% of the total from that state. The exclusion of Negroes from this field of employment constitutes in itself a serious problem of discrimination in view of the veterans' preferences established by the G. I. Bill.

The situation in the offices of the United States Employment Service in the Southern states ranges from poor to deplorable. In Tennessee and Louisiana, not a single Negro could be found on the payroll of this agency, despite the fact that separate offices are maintained for Negro workers and veterans who constitute about 50% of the persons served. This problem is known to exist in other Southern states, and there is widespread dissatisfaction with the quality of counseling and other services extended to Negro veterans in this area.

We were unable to find any evidence that the Veterans' Employment Service was making an effort to obtain employment opportunities for Negro veterans with special skills or abilities. No Negroes are employed as Contact Representatives by the Veterans' Employment Service in the Southern states, and very few were so employed in other sections of the country.

The use of Negro personnel on Rating Boards appears not to have received any consideration from those responsible for these appointments. In only one city covered in the survey were Negroes reported as serving on Rating Boards. In New York City, which has 15 Rating Boards, no Negroes were found.

Although the establishment and operation of Veterans' Information Centers is not a prime responsibility of the Veterans Administration, the services offered in these Centers can be most helpful in directing veterans to proper sources of assistance and information. Negro staff members were found in only 12 of the 49 Information Centers included in the investigation, and in none of the large Southern cities were Negroes found on the staff. Our conferences with veterans who had visited many of these Centers revealed their strong feeling that the Centers have not been very helpful. This accounts for the fact that local affiliates of the Urban League in practically every large city are being called upon to help veterans with their adjustment problems. In some cities, local League offices register and serve an average of 50 veterans per day.

Loans to Veterans

The general feeling in most of the cities studied indicates that loans to Negro veterans are almost out of the question. In one city, it was reported that a half dozen Negro veterans had received loans with which to purchase trucks. In no other city were we able to locate a Negro veteran who had received a loan for the purchase of a home, or the establishment of a business. We recognize that the problem of loans to all veterans has not been satisfactorily resolved, but it is obvious that Negro veterans are not receiving adequate advice and information regarding their opportunities in this regard.

Summary and Recommendations

Our survey of the adjustment problems of Negro veterans reveals many gaps and inadequacies that can be corrected with proper administrative procedures. This report has pointed up the most serious bottlenecks in the program. Briefly summarizing them, it is clearly obvious that:

1. Negro veterans are not finding desirable employment in the majority of cities.

2. The established machinery for assisting Negro veterans in their search for employment is not serving them adequately.

3. Vocational training available to Negro veterans in most communities is so inadequate as to be almost non-existent.

4. On-the-job training and apprenticeship opportunities are rarely available to Negro veterans.

5. The Veterans Administration has discriminated against Negro veterans and workers in the appointment of personnel to assist veterans with their adjustment problems. This is especially true in the Southern states.

6. The Veterans' Employment Service has made little or no effort to utilize Negro personnel in its counseling and job-finding programs. This, too, is characteristic of Southern states and cities.

7. Negro veterans are finding it almost impossible to secure loans for business or other purposes under the terms of the G. I. Bill.

8. The quality of counseling available to Negro veterans in most cities is seriously impaired because of the lack of information regarding opportunities in training, employment, and business.

In the light of these findings, and in order to improve the services offered Negro veterans in their efforts to adjust themselves to civilian life, the following recommendations are submitted:

1. That competent Negroes be added to the Administrative Staff of the Veterans' Affairs Office to assist in the formulation of policies and procedures affecting services to Negro veterans.

2. That Negro personnel be added to the staff of the Veterans Administration at regional, state, and local levels to assist in the implementation of all phases of the veterans' service program.

3. That the Veterans Administration investigate discriminatory practices in the Veterans' Employment Division of the United States Employment Service and effect their immediate correction.

4. That the Veterans Administration investigate widespread discrimination against Negro veterans in the matter of on-the-job training and apprenticeship training and exert its influence to prevent such practices.

5. That the Veterans Administration use the powers vested in it by Congress to see that adequate training provisions are established for Negro veterans in those areas where they do not now exist.

6. That the Veterans Administration examine training programs now available to Negro veterans in public and private secondary and vocational schools, colleges, and universities to determine the needs of the schools with respect to equipment, teachers, and curricula.

If Bethlehem had been Birmingham...

Have you ever thought what would happen if Jesus Christ were to return to the earth — to the United States of America — now — today — as a Negro? What would some Americans think of a man who preached "BROTHERHOOD! EQUALITY OF MEN IN THE SIGHT OF GOD!

What would Senator Bilbo say if such a thing were to happen? What would your family and friends say? What would your Minister say? WHAT WOULD YOU SAY?

Suppose it came about this way . . .

Bethlehem could be Birmingham. Judea could be Alabama, and Palestine — America. Instead of the first century, the time is now — the twentieth century. The stable becomes a tenant farmer's shack, set down in the midst of poverty and privation worse than that suffered by "God's chosen people," — amid a family more despised and ill-treated than Joseph's.

HOLY FAMILY

The mother is a cotton-picker who day after day drags her aching body along the never-ending rows of white fluff — until her time comes. The father is a cotton-picker too, with strong gnarled hands and tired, hopeless eyes. The baby is fat and sweet — just like most babies — but he is black. A black baby born to parents as lowly as David's own. God has chosen the weak to confound the strong.

AS IT WAS BEFORE

The colored Jesus walks among the sick and afflicted — healing their wounds, raising the dead, counselling and preaching, working miracles, helping the poor, and praising God. He is in New Orleans, Chicago, Harlem. He talks about "BROTHERHOOD" — "Love Ye one another," He says. And the crowds follow Him in the streets, reaching to touch His garments — flinging themselves at His feet, calling Him "SAVIOUR!"

AND HE SPOKE IN PARABLES

His sermons are parables. He tells the story of the man who sowed his seed — some on fertile ground, some on poor soil, and some on rock. "As ye sow, so shall ye reap." He extolled God-given grace and beauty — "Consider the lillies of the field how they grow. They toil not, neither do they spin; yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed as one of them."

His audiences were spellbound. Black and white — Catholic and Protestant — Jew and Gentile, they listened to the words of the Black Christ. "This is the first and greatest Commandment: That ye love the Lord Thy God with all thy heart and all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself."

"Never has anyone spoken like this man," was the theme of each comment from the listeners. Black and white people were one with and in Christ the Redeemer. That is — most people were. But there were some discordant voices.

BACK IN BIRMINGHAM —

A white preacher challenged his congregation, "Is this black man the one you are willing to call Christ? Will you follow a Negro? Do you expect salvation to come through one like Him?"

The audience was quiet, listening to their preacher. They had heard of the miracles performed by the Black One whom men were calling Savior. They had seen some of the healed and comforted ones who told their stories of the laying on of hands. There were those in the congregation who were afraid that their preacher was being blasphemous in belittling the black man who was called "Jesus."

But there was none who had the courage to stand on his feet and defend his belief. In Alabama, it was dangerous to take up for Negroes. They had to be kept in their "place". The race problem had been "solved" in the South, and Negroes knew what was expected of them.

The preacher went on — "This black talks about EQUALITY! He wants us to treat blacks and whites as equals. EQUALS! Do you know what that means?"

There was a pulsating silence in the church as every man and woman there waited for the answer. It came like a rifle-shot in the throbbing stillness, "INTER-MARRIAGE!"

"That's what EQUALITY means. He can call it brotherhood, or Christianity or anything he wants. It still means that a Negro can marry your daughter and you've got to like it!

A murmur began in the congregation — at first low and indistinct. Gradually one voice stood clear above the others. A man yelled, "We don't want no niggers marryin' our daughters!" The whole group took up the cry and other voices were heard saying "No we don't! Keep 'em in their place — EQUALITY for us and niggers! — Kill him! the black — He oughta be lynched!"

For a few minutes there was bedlam — hate was a living thing, penetrating every heart in the church. Then the preacher's voice rose above the hub-bub as he said, "Listen! It's good to hear the true believers in Christianity speak out against an impostor like this. I'm proud to know that here in Birmingham at least, Christian people are not afraid to take steps to STRIKE DOWN anybody who has the blasphemous audacity to call himself the Son of God. As we go out from this place, let us hasten to our friends and neighbors to tell them that we must join together to prevent this black man from destroying us and our beautiful America with his senseless ravings and preposterous schemes to gain equality for Negroes. I preach to you from the Scripture. I carry the word of God who said that blacks were to be "the servants among men!" Take this word of God with you wherever you go, and soon we shall see an end to this Black Christ!"

AND IN WASHINGTON . . .

There were Southern senators and congressmen talking about the "upstart" who was calling himself Jesus Christ, the Son of God. Some of the Northern senators who were good friends of theirs agreed with them when they said, "This is something which threatens the whole nation! It is our duty to DO something about it!"

One man, named Bilbo, was particularly agitated — "This is worse than the FEPC! It's bad enough for a few people to want equality for the niggers, but to claim that GOD WANTS IT TOO! It's got to be stopped! I'll talk on the floor of the Senate for the rest of my life, before I'll so double-cross the good people of Mississippi as to sit idly by and let a thing like this continue!"

And so, the affairs of State were disregarded while the legislators concerned themselves with "the threat to the nation." Bilbo and Eastland and Rankin set the pace in the House and Senate and the other representatives of the American people played follow the leader.

FINALLY . . .

The Black Christ returned to His native Southland. where He felt that He was needed even worse than He was in the Harlems of the North. In the cities and in the rural areas He preached and healed and performed miracles. He stood in fields, on the banks of rivers, in unpainted country churches — and in all these places He preached the doctrine of the BROTHERHOOD OF MAN.

One night — on Friday it was — He was in a small town in Alabama, not far from Birmingham. There were both white and Negroes in the audience which listened to Him.

The people in Birmingham had heard that He would be there, and urged on by the same preacher who had been inveighing against the "Black Jesus" for months and months, a group of church people banded into a mob to go and hear what he had to say.

IN THE STILLNESS AND SHADOWS . . .

The mob rode from the city to the outskirts of the town where the Black Saviour was supposed to be preaching. There the leader asked the first passerby if he knew where they could find this man. Told that He was to be found in a small Negro church of unknown denomination, the leader called to the mob to follow him, saying, "Let's go get 'im!"

Into the quiet and peace of the Church where only the voice of Christ was to be heard, burst the sound of heavy boots. The leader clumped forward to stand before Christ, who had stopped speaking upon his entry.

Turning to face the audience, the leader of the mob addressed them thus:

> Is this the man you have called "Savior" and "Christ" and "Redeemer"? Is it this black that you call the Anointed One? Do you expect salvation to come through one like him? Look at him! He's a NIGGER! He's an imposter and a blasphemous one at that.

Listen here, all this coon wants is equality — and to a coon that means a white woman. All he wants is for the like of him to be able to strut around being smart to white people and acting uppity.

This is America! Down here we've solved the race problem and these Negroes have got to be kept in their place!

At first the church was quiet after this speech. Then a voice rang out, from way back in the church — "Let's lynch him!" The one voice became the roar of many voices, growing and amplifying like the crescendo in a symphony, "LYNCH HIM!" — until it filled the church.

Wild men ran to the altar, laid rough hands on Christ, and dragged Him unprotesting out of the church door. All this time the Christian congregation had done nothing to stay the angry crowd. Now they sat stunned listening to the noise of the mob outside.

"FORGIVE THEM? FATHER . . . "

It didn't take long to find the tree in the woods where a rope had already been hung in readiness. Christ was stripped, scourged and spat upon. Vile epithets were hurled at Him along with rocks and clumps of earth. Finally, He was hanged. "Forgive them, Father, for they know not what they do!" And then it was over. Men had killed their God in human form — because his skin was black. They said, "He had to die; these Negroes must be kept in their place. This will be a lesson to them not to go around talking about EQUALITY and wanting the same rights as white people."

"FANTASTIC"

Yes, it is fantastic — but only because there has been no black Jesus. The possibility of such a thing happening to the Risen Christ if he were to be black is not fantastic.

There are American Christians who would take part in such a demonstration of hate and fiendishness.

And there are other Christians who, in the face of the fury of their fellow men, would lift neither finger nor voice to prevent such an injustice from being done. They are afraid to admit their convictions about these things.

And the Church — what does it do about all this? Very little! To be sure, there are some strong-willed churchmen who will by word or deed challenge their brethren to live up to their faith; but they are too few. What is your church willing to do? What is your preacher willing to do? What are YOU willing to do?

NEW YORK—Nelson C. Jackson, professor of Community Organization at the Atlanta University School of Social Work was this week appointed head of the Southern Field Office in Atlanta of the National Urban League.

Nationally known as a social worker and educator, Jackson will assume the post this month, while continuing his present work at the Atlanta School. He will take full charge of the League's Southern program, June 1.

Jackson is a graduate of Morehouse College and the Atlanta University School of Social Work. He had done work toward his doctorate at the University of Chicago.

Employment of Negroes on policy-making levels within the Veterans' Employment Service (USES) was disclosed by Perry Faulkner, VES Chief, in a recent Washington conference with National Urban League officials. Faulkner also announced a plan for hiring additional Negro personnel under an expanded VES program which authorizes Assistant and Field Assistant Employment Representatives working in coordination with State USES offices, but responsible to the VES office in Washington.

In a subsequent letter to LeRoy W. Jeffries, the Urban League's Assistant Industrial Relations Director, Faulkner stated that a Negro Assistant Veterans' Employment Representative was already working in the District of Columbia, while other Field Assistants are on staffs in Ohio, Michigan, and New York. He said further that "as soon as it is feasible, under our present budget, and proposed budgets...we should like to have in those states where it is deemed necessary Negro Assistant Veterans Employment Representatives to serve on...State Veterans Employment staffs."

"A veteran is a veteran..."

In a re-statement of the Veterans' Employment Service non-discrimination policy, Faulkner said, "A'veteran' is defined for us by law and we do not have any inclination to look at it in any other light. A veteran is a veteran, be he White, Negro, or of any other

Under the present VES plan, there is one Veterans' Representative in each state, which is broken down into areas, with Assistants and Field Assistants allocated to the state according to veteran population. These assistants are responsible for making contacts with employers in the interest of veterans, and maintaining regular contact with employers and veterans' organizations with a view to keeping them advised of veterans available for employment and the veterans advised of opportunities for employment. The work of the Negro staff members is integrated with that of the offices with which they are attached. Placement for the jobs is made through Civil Service.

NUL Report Points Up Bias

In a report on "Adjustment of Negro veterans" issued in March and sent to USES officials, the National Urban League noted that the Veterans' Employment Service had made"little or no effort to utilize Negro personnel in its counseling and job-finding programs." Negro veterans seeking assistance through the service, the report stated, expressed "a lack of confidence in this agency's efforts to secure employment for them, particularly in jobs other than the traditional Negro jobs."

Jeffries, commenting on the new VES program, called attention to the numerous conferences held by Urban League officials with VA, USES, and other Department of Labor personnel in an effort to facilitate placement of Negro veterans and to eliminate discrimination throughout all the states. He expressed the hope that the plan would cover southern states, particularly, where there is a large concentration of Negro veterans, and widespread dissatisfaction with the quality of counseling and other services available to them.

We are sending this packet of literature to you because we know you are interested in vocational and educational guidance, as well as in the activities of the National Urban League.

These materials have been prepared for our 15th Vocational Opportunity Campaign. Do you know of others who would like to receive a packet similar to this? Do you know of any community agencies or schools that may wish to participate in the Vocational Opportunity Campaign, that we might not have contacted?

We will be very glad to receive criticisms and comments on the literature if you care to send them.

By Nelson Antrim Crawford

THEY JUST WANT A CHANCE

THE National Urban League, backed by some of the wealthiest and most distinguished citizens of the United States, has set apart March for its fourteenth Vocational Opportunity Campaign for Negro Youth.

I know of no project which will pay better returns to the nation—whites as much as Negroes, maybe more. Negroes are a minority group, about 10 per cent of the population. For the most part they are an underprivileged group, undernourished, poorly housed, less well educated than their white neighbors.

It is a truism of history that the existence of such a group is an ever present danger to a nation—its health, its economics, its politics, its unity. More than formerly, it is a menace today when unity is recognized as a national essential.

I have heard innumerable explanations for the low position of the Negro in American life. The only one that holds water in my estimation—and the estimation of practically all students of the problem—is that Negroes as a whole do not get enough money to live on properly. In other words, the problem is an economic problem.

Why don't they get enough money? There are two reasons, which tie closely together. One is that employers don't want them for good jobs. The other is that they are not qualified for good jobs. In spite of prejudice, there is no doubt that more employers would want them if they were better trained.

Here is where the Urban League's program comes in. The league is seeking to provide better education for Negroes, especially in training them for occupations that require skill. It also is striving to stimulate Negro youth to take advantage of such education. At the same time it is combating the prejudices which still exist against hiring skilled Negroes.

Only two arguments are ever advanced against such a program. One is that Negroes are not mentally capable. That is sheer nonsense. A race that has produced agricultural scientists like George Washington Carver, educators like Alain Locke, writers like Langston Hughes, needs no defense against such a charge.

True, these are exceptional men, but the general run of Negroes employed in war plants proved reliable and efficient. I myself am familiar with Piney Woods School, established by Laurence Jones among the most backward Negroes, and I know that boys and girls trained there have developed skills of which white youth could well be proud.

THE other argument advanced against training Negroes is that they would then compete with white labor. I for one would be ashamed to admit my work was so poor it couldn't stand competition.

This selfish argument is getting less attention all the time as the more progressive labor unions are admitting Negroes and in some instances elevating them to high office. Around a million and a half Negroes are union members.

In developing vocational opportunities for Negroes any American can help. If he can do no more, he can at least give his interest and sympathy to sound Negro education. In a democratic nation every citizen should have the chance to develop and utilize all his ability. Negroes ask no more.

PLAN

AND PREPARE!

The National Urban League conducts a year-round vocational guidance program, designed to assist local Urban Leagues, other community agencies, and schools and colleges throughout the country.

One of the special guidance projects is the VOCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY CAMPAIGN, which originated in 1930. The campaign is held for one week in the spring of each year, and special activities direct the attention of Negro youth to the need for planning their vocational futures.

WHY?

To point out to Negro boys and girls that they must secure training and develop skills in order to widen their chances for employment.

WHY?

To demonstrate to teachers, counselors, and school administrators that Negro boys and girls should be given opportunity to train for all types of jobs.

WHY?

To convince employers that it is to their advantage to hire workers according to their preparation and skills, without regard to race or color.

VOCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY BULLETIN

No. 1 A National Urban League Publication January 1947

RECEIVED JAN 27 1947 Southern Regional Council

FOREWORD

With this first issue of the VOCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY BULLETIN, the National Urban League begins a series of bulletins, to be published occasionally, devoted to information on training, jobs and careers.

Urban League affiliates across the nation, community organizations and agencies, and schools and colleges are invited to tell us the kind of information they would like to appear in this bulletin.

If you wish to be placed on the mailing list to receive the bulletin, please address your request to Ann Tanneyhill, Director of Vocational Guidance, National Urban League, 1133 Broadway, New York 10, New York.

VOCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY CAMPAIGN LITERATURE

The National Urban League's 15th Vocational Opportunity Campaign will be observed March 16-23, 1947. Special literature has been prepared for the Campaign, and other materials are available for the use of cooperating groups and schools, students, teachers, counselors, librarians, etc. These materials are described on the following pages. An order form is enclosed. Orders should be placed immediately so that they can be received in advance of the opening of the Campaign.

The posters and map should be displayed on school bulletin boards, in libraries, in the lobbies of community centers, settlement houses, etc., and wherever young people assemble.

The map, AMERICANS OF NEGRO LINEAGE, has many uses. It can serve in classes -- civics, social studies, history, English, etc., as the basis for biographical stories of the individuals, papers and student talks on the vocations represented, and classroom discussion.

YOUR CAREER has been prepared for youth to stimulate interest in future vocations. Under the guidance of the teacher or counselor, students can study the world of work and their own preparation for it.

NEGRO HEROES is a comic book, useful in vocational counseling. We are experimenting in the use of the comic book as an educational medium in race relations and guidance. In addition to the enjoyment young people will get from reading it by themselves, NEGRO HEROES can be used by groups, in discussions and in the classroom. Teachers and counselors are urged to have student discussion of the individual qualities of character necessary for "heroic" performance in everyday life; the life backgrounds of individuals portrayed, and the physical, mental, and educational qualifications necessary for the vocations pictured. The booklet is also excellent for use in intercultural education.

The National Urban League is anxious to receive comments of educators, teachers, counselors, social workers, parents, and especially young people, who read NEGRO HEROES in order to plan for future issues of the booklet.

Dear Mr. Triggs:

The individual whose name appears above, has filed a personnel record with the National Urban League, and has indicated a desire to be considered as a candidate for future employment with the National Urban League or one of its affiliated organizations.

We are anxious to complete the personnel record by securing statements from persons who can evaluate the professional training and ability of the applicant.

The applicant has given your name as a reference. From your knowledge of the background, education, and employment experiences of the applicant, and from contacts you have had with him, you are doubtless in a position to give an estimate of his abilities, and to tell us something about his character and personality.

If possible, your statement should give information on personal qualities, work performance, administrative ability and any qualifications and assets for working in the field of race relations.

Your statement will be greatly appreciated, for it will assist us in evaluating the candidate's fitness. A self-addressed, stamped envelope is enclosed for your convenience.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

Thank you for your letter of March 28 and the information concerning the Office of the Veterans Administration in Tulsa, Oklahoma. This is a very pleasant surprise, and I hope similar action will take place in some of the other states. I received a copy of the Mississippi Study just a few days ago, and it certainly doesn't make one feel very hopeful about the condition in that state.

You will recall that I prepared a statement for General Erskine and suggested that he call a meeting of the four Consultants. I had a reply from him reminding me that the Retraining and Reemployment Administration will be terminated July 1. He suggested, however, that I make the report official for the Committee, and he would discuss it with General Bradley, Mr. Schwellenbach and others in the two departments. I am planning to do this, since I have the green light from the other Consultants.

I note, however, that General Bradley has asked to be relieved of his V.A. responsibilities as soon as possible. I have no idea who is likely to succeed him, but I hope it will be a person with a much better understanding of and more sympathy with the problems with which we are concerned.

Sorry I didn't get down to Atlanta last month. I looked forward to seeing you. No doubt I shall be making a Southern trip before summer.

With best wishes, I am

Dear Dr. Trigg:

This office has been requested to convene an interested group of Negro citizens in state problems to meet with representatives of the Georgia Citizens Council to discuss possibilities of participation by Negroes in this state program. This meeting will be held at the Community Planning Council, 11 Pryor Street, Monday, May 5, at 3:00 P. M.

The Georgia Citizens Council is an organization established by the legislature, its board members named by the Governor, and its program is to serve all the people in areas of health, education, welfare, housing and other phases of community planning. The program has not reached the Negro citizens of the state. Help is being asked to discuss ways and means of securing our representation.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

I understand that you have a mimeographed list "Trial Directory of Veterans' Organizations in Southern States". I wonder if this has been completed to the point where it is available to other agencies and organizations. If so, I would like to have a copy of it for use in connection with the distribution of vocational guidance materials which we will have available throughout the year.

We are building a rather extensive list of schools, colleges, organizations, and other groups interested in vocational guidance and training, and I would like to have the agencies working with veterans in the southern states on our mailing list.

With appreciation, I am

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

Will you help us do a job?

We are attaching to this letter "Your Career in the Building Trades," a six-page, green and white folder. This is not just another folder of advice--but part of machinery being set in operation to integrate Negro workers into the building trades.

When we began working intensively some time ago with national housing officials--and some private builders--on the matter of seeing that Negroes were included in the Nation's huge public and private housing program, we found

1) labor shortage as critical as material shortage

2) Negro labor shorter still--and

3) an alarming reluctance of Negroes to go into the building trades.

There were other factors, too:

1) some building trades unions do not welcome Negro workers

2) apprenticeships in the trades are not generally open to Negroes--and

3) employers--where there is no FEPC law--usually bypass Negro workers.

Our process is to begin at the beginning--and that is where "Your Career in the Building Trades" comes in. While we are pursuing the important program of trying to make openings with employers, and unions, we must also be sure

1) that there are capable, well-trained men to fill the openings--and

2) that they know how to proceed to get jobs once they are trained.

That is where we need your support.

Will you help this vital process by talking or writing about this pamphlet whenever you can? Will you ask us for other copies to give away to people who need them or to place in spots where they can be used effectively--or send us names and addresses for this purpose?

Please accept our gracious appreciation for any help you can give on this score.

Yours sincerely,

URBAN LEAGUE BREAKS UTILITY JOB BIAS

New York - November 20, 1947: - The first Negro white-collar workers were hired by the Cleveland Electric Illuminating Company this week, marking the success of long-time negotiations by the Cleveland and the National Urban Leagues to break the utility company's job bias. Announcing the employment policy change, Clifford Minton, Industrial Relations Secretary, Cleveland Urban League, said that the new employees would have every opportunity for advancement.

Although the Cleveland utility company has always employed Negro workers, this is the first break away from the "traditional Negro" job category. It is the second private utility firm in Cleveland to employ Negroes as white collar workers. The Ohio Bell Telephone Company, while not yet hiring switchboard operators, has employed Negroes as collectors, commercial representatives and clerks.

White Collar Survey Due Soon

A complete survey of Negroes in white-collar jobs around the country will be released to the public by the National Urban League before the end of the year. The survey, being made by Leroy Jeffries, Assistant Director, Industrial Relations Department, will show results to date of an intensive campaign begun by the National and Urban Leagues more than two years ago to integrate Negroes into the utility and retail merchandising job fields, as well as other non-Negro private concerns such as banks, insurance companies, law and manufacturing firms.

"Privately-owned businesses," Mr. Jeffries stated in discussing the survey, "are the hub of the American economy. The best measure of the Negro worker's participation in the country's economy is the extent to which he is integrated into these'basic' job fields."

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

I am very pleased to learn from Nelson C. Jackson, the Southern Field Director of the National Urban League, that we have your consent to serve as a member of our South-wide Advisory Council. At a time when the Urban League movement is responding with unparelleled success to the challenges and opportunities that lie before us throughout the nation, it is distinctly encouraging to know that we have behind us so strong and representative an advisory group as the South-wide Council constitutes. Your help will be of inestimable value in guaging both the nature of social problems in the southern area and the application of Urban League techniques to those problems as we find them.

You will be interested in knowing something of the recent history of our Southern Office. For many years, the Southern Field Division of the National Urban League was little more than a central recording office for our southern affiliates. During the last ten years, consistent efforts have been made to increase the importance of this office by providing additional staff, organizing new Urban Leagues in southern cities, and offering a supervisory and supportive service from our Atlanta headquarters that would be comparable to the service rendered by the national headquarters to the entire country. The result of this persistent improvement program is seen today, both in the increased size of staff (three professional workers) and in the steady spread of the Urban League movement.

Jacksonville, Florida, is our newest local Urban League affiliate, and we have every reason to feel that this unit will be a matter of pride for the whole movement. More than this, we have the effects of our well-known Community Relations Project, which was carried forward in five northern and eight southern cities, with the most successful operations being located in the South - Winston-Salem, St. Petersburgh, Chattanooga, Tulsa and Oklahoma City. These are only a few of the cities in the southern area which have recorded appreciatively the counsel and assistance brought to them by our community relations experts.

This is a long first letter, but I am anxious, while thanking you for your willingness to serve with us, also to inform you somewhat on the recent background of the movement with which you are formally associated in a regional capacity. Just as our national Executive Secretary will depend upon the Southern Field Director for professional interpretation of the work and its needs in his area, so will our national Executive Board depend upon your South-wide Council for the layman's interpretation of the League's role and effectiveness.

Contributions to the National Urban League are deductible for income tax purposes

Thank you again for what you are doing to advance not only the economic status of the nearly ten million Negroes who live in the South, but also the interest of the entire American nation by proving that American teamwork - which is to say interracial cooperation - really does work.

Sincerely yours,

Several weeks ago, in a telephone conversation, I asked if you would consent to serve as a member of the Advisory Committee of the Urban League for the Southern area. I am formally asking that question now, because I would like to get the Committee set up as soon as possible. The function of the Committee would be to lend perspective and guidance to the work of the League in the Southern States, and I feel that our two organizations should work more closely together for mutual benefit, since both are concerned with what happens - and more important, what we can do about some of the problems which we mutually have in the region.

The Committee will not meet formally until later on, when there are funds to permit the calling of the group together. However, I hope that it will be possible to talk with one or two persons who might consent to serve in the Atlanta area about some of the situations which are needful of attention, and some progress can be made.

INTRODUCTION

The Southern Field Division of the National Urban League was organized in 1919 to carry out the program of the National Urban League in the South. Its territory extends from Virginia to Texas and South to the Gulf of Mexico. The program of community organization engaged in concerns the development of broader service to Negroes in health, housing, education, welfare and industrial relations. It extends programs through organizing additional Leagues, consulting with existing branches, agencies and groups, and seeks to secure moral and financial support through the interest of white and Negro Southerners.

The Southern Office was manned by an Executive and an Office Secretary from its beginning until 1946, when an additional staff member was added to work with schools and colleges in vocational guidance and counseling. This staff member, in addition to his duties as Assistant Southern Field Director, seeks to help youth find careers in new fields and to provide information regarding trends in employment. The appointment in 1947 of a Director of Promotion and Publicity in the office will strengthen the League's public relations and provide interpretation of services and needs in the South. There are now five staff members in the office.

A South-wide Advisory Committee, composed of distinguished white and Negro Southerners, organized in the latter part of 1947, will serve as a sounding board for Southern League operations and as a bulwark of support and advice in the development of the program in the region.

SERVICES TO LOCAL LEAGUES

Richmond, Atlanta, Tampa, Miami, New Orleans, Little Rock, Fort Worth, Oklahoma City and Memphis were visited by the Southern Field staff. One visit was made to six of the Leagues by the National Director and the Southern Field Director. In this swing around the circuit, interpretation of the National to the local was made, program strengthened in certain communities, and interpretation of the local to the National accomplished. In addition, it set the stage for closer working operations during 1948.

In visiting League cities, consultations were held with Boards, Staffs, Chests and Councils and key citizens in communities for the purpose of strengthening the League movement wherever possible. It meant, in one community, the securing of an Executive for an agency; in another, the strengthening of vocational guidance and counseling operations; in still a third, the development of industrial relations procedures; and in others, the tightening of community organization procedure by cooperation with local, state and national agencies.

NEW LEAGUE PROSPECTS

Birmingham, Alabama; Jackson, Mississippi; Mobile, Alabama; Baton Rouge, Louisiana; Winston-Salem, North Carolina; Tulsa, Oklahoma; Charleston, South Carolina; Columbus, Georgia; Houston, Texas; Norfolk, Virginia; and Chattanooga, Tennessee all expressed interest in organization of branches of the Urban League. The cities above mentioned, except Chattanooga, Tennessee, Charleston, South Carolina and Houston, Texas were visited during the year, and in several organizing committees are at work. During this period, also, Jacksonville, Florida organized a branch of the Urban League and was accepted by the National Office near the end of the year. Each of the cities visited during 1947 will be visited again during 1948 to aid in the further organization of League branches. Four Southern States do not have Leagues - namely, North and South Carolina, Alabama and Mississippi. It is planned during 1948 to concentrate on these four states.

The Southern Field professional staff has traveled approximately 40,000 miles during the year, and in addition carried on a tremendous amount of correspondence in lieu of travel because of other duties in connection with the operation of the office.

OPERATIONAL AREAS

In promoting services of the National Office, the Southern Field Division has attempted to develop a higher quality of service in the South and to cooperate with agencies which have specific functions in housing, health, industry, welfare and education. The following operational areas engaged our interest:

1. Social Welfare

One or more members of the staff of the Southern Field Division has worked closely with Chests and Councils in a number of Southern cities in connection with Urban League activities in aiding, developing or expanding services for Negroes in public welfare, recreation and similar services. In addition, members have worked directly with organizing groups to set up such agencies as the Atlanta Association for Convalescent and Aged, the organization of an Advisory Committee to the Georgia Citizens Council, and through consultation with local and state departments of Public Welfare have aided in specific programs. Staff persons have participated in national and regional activities as Executive Committee members of the U. S. Children's Bureau, the American Association of Social Workers, Association for the Study of Community Organization, Georgia Conference on Social Welfare and other conference programs.

2. Industrial Relations

New industries are moving South. There is a supply of Negro labor unused to its fullest extent. Efforts to integrate Negroes into industries coming South are dependent upon the employment of skilled Industrial Relations Secretaries in Urban League branches. It is hoped that this service can be expanded during 1948. At present there are two Industrial Relations Secretaries in local Leagues - Atlanta and Richmond.

During 1947, visits were made to the local Ford Plant by staff members of the Atlanta and National Offices and a score of other agencies were visited in connection with employment policies of organizations with the hope of securing the greater use of Negro workers. Demonstration projects were discussed for New Orleans and Memphis to expand the services of the League in the industrial relations field. In this connection there has been a close relationship between industrial relations and vocational guidance in the Southern Field Division.

3. Vocational Guidance

Fifty-one colleges and one hundred and seventy-one secondary schools were visited or contacted in preparation for the year's vocational guidance activities. Initial plans for state-wide committees were formulated in Georgia, Florida and Alabama. It is expected that several of these committees will be fully organized during 1948. The purpose of these groups is to stimulate activities among youths to help them plan careers and to help find a place in industry for those who have secured the skills.

4. Education

Several schools and colleges have called on the Southern Field Division to help plan curriculums. In addition, staff members have participated as teachers in local colleges and with the Georgia Workers Education Service. In each instance, it has meant the interpretation of League operations and greater understanding of League program.

5. Housing

Housing continues to be a number one problem and a project of the Southern Field Division. Cooperative efforts have been fruitful with representatives of the Federal Housing Agencies. Staff members have participated in housing conferences and have alerted local representatives of the League to participate in housing hearings which have been held by Congressional groups in the region. It is planned to continue this type of service at an accelerated pace during 1948.

PROMOTION AND PUBLICITY

The Director of Promotion and Publicity for the Southern Field Division has organized Urban League Guilds in Richmond, Norfolk and Atlanta. Requests have come from a number of Leagues in the South for the organization of similar groups of women to help interpret and promote the program of the Urban League in their communities. This will be done during 1948.

Through a weekly column carried in the ATLANTA JOURNAL, it is estimated that 15,000,000 copies of the column have been read in the South. The column provides an opportunity of explaining the work of the League in several of its releases. In addition, newspaper publicity has been carried and articles by the Southern Field staff have been released in OPPORTUNITY, the SECRETARIAT, SOCIAL WORK DIGEST, SURVEY GRAPHIC, and papers were read before several learned societies and organizations, including the National Vocational Guidance meeting in Columbus, Ohio, the National Urban League Conference and the Georgia Conference on Social Welfare.

Each of the Southern Field Professional Staff members attended conventions of college fraternities and sororities which met at the year's end. Mr. Edwards attended the Delta convention in San Antonio, Texas, which led to a closer cooperative effort between the National Urban League and this organization. Similarly, Miss Chisholm attended the Omega Psi Phi convention in Detroit, and the Southern Field Director worked with the Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity in Atlanta. In each instance there was a commitment regarding possibilities of financial support during 1948.

The Southern Field Division will attempt during 1948 to raise between $35,000 and $50,000 to carry on the work of the Urban Leagues in the South. This amount is needed for the development of additional branches of the Urban League, for the organization of institutes throughout the South, and for the operations of the Southern Field Office. Insofar as this is successful the work will advance.

Natyal Urban League

March 5, 1948

The Reverend Mr. Conrad Myrick
St. Andrew's Church
1180 Eleventh Avenue, South
Birmingham 5, Alabama

Dear Mr. Myrick:

We have been terribly busy here with the Southwide Meeting on Human and Civil Rights, which occurred the twenty-seventh of February. My apologies for this long delay in answering your letter.

I have the very greatest confidence in the Urban League. I have worked with it in Richmond and in Baltimore and very closely here in Atlanta, where I am a member of the Board of the Atlanta Urban League and a member of the Advisory Committee of the Southern Field Division of the National Urban League.

Everywhere that I have known the League, its officials have been responsible, practical, straightforward and very useful.

The League always has had strong links with employers. It has the good will of organized labor also. It is not an agitational organization. It has a job to do and it goes about doing it.

It is clear from all the controversy of today that the main idea that is pushed in the agitation for a Federal fair employment practices law will continue to grow. Our Council is not opposed to such a law, but we are anxious for the South to come around in its own day-to-day conduct of community affairs to a habit of fair play, which will need only a minimum of enforcement from any source. In my judgment the Urban League is a very valuable instrument in producing within the South and within local communities negotiated and agreed change.

Each local League provides itself with an industrial secretary. He becomes a specialist in fitting Negro workers into better jobs. He has no power except the power of negotiating consent. Of course, the progress in that regard is never enough to satisfy people with all-out views. But they get a surprising improvement simply by learning each situation and bringing knowledge to bear on each local problem.

I am enclosing some pamphlet material about the origin, purpose, procedure and scope of the League, which Mr. Nelson Jackson, Director of the Southern Field Office here in Atlanta has sent to be forwarded to you.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell
Executive Director

Dear Doctor:

The Birmingham Young Business Men's Club, a civic organization here, has become interested in the Urban League, and are investigating the advisability of participation in it.

As their Chaplain they asked me to write to you on this, wanting your opinion on it, since I told them of the good work you are doing in racial relationship in Atlanta.

These men are deffinately interested in this phase of our life. Will you send me some material on 1) its origin, 2) its purpose, 3) its proceedure, 4) its personnel, 5) its scope.

We will appreciate this very much.

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

At present the National Urban League is engaged in its Annual Fund-Raising Campaign. The goal for the Southern Field Division is $50,000.

We sincerely appeal to you for both your moral and financial support in this vast undertaking. The need for strengthening and broadening the program is urgent.

For thirty-seven years, the Urban League has been "on the job" in behalf of both the vast Negro population and the American community in general.

Examine the record for 1947 alone!
Consider the broad prospectus for 1948!!

The attached copy presents, in brief, the program of the Urban League. Doesn't this exceptional record warrant your support?

We hope that, after serious consideration of this vital program, you will be as generous as possible in making a personal contribution toward the organization's future operations. And won't you please serve as "Ambassador of Goodwill" for the League program among your many friends and associates?

Checks made payable to the National Urban League may be sent directly to this office toward the Southern Campaign quota.

ON THE LINE

By BOB CONSIDINE

International News Service Staff Writer

NEW YORK--(INS)--The passing show:

Some of the finest work being done in America today is that of the Urban League, formed to do something constructive about the so-called "Negro problem" at root level.

Twice as many people are working in the U. S. today than in 1932, but the percentage rise among colored persons has been only a third. In many instances, on the one hand, we are giving colored persons every opportunity to become educated at public expense and, on the other hand, rejecting them for the jobs and professions for which they have been trained.

Robert W. Dowling, chairman of the Urban League Service Fund, whose group includes Winthrop Rockefeller, Gardner Cowles and others, said it better Tuesday:

"Purely from a business viewpoint, the failure to utilize trained Negro workers is an economic waste that not only reduces our productive capacity but keeps a large segment of our population on a low living standard.

"This produces, in turn, conditions resulting in juvenile delinquency, crime, poor health and housing and--inevitably--higher welfare costs."

Last year 748,300 persons received the benefit of various Urban League services throughout the country, including job placement, vocational guidance, creation of new job opportunities and many other social welfare activities.

PATH NOT EASY

The Urban League's path is not an easy one. For instance, the country's greatest current shortage of manpower is in the building trades. Statistics show that there is a need for at least 100,000 additional carpenters, bricklayers, plumbers and other skilled craftsmen. The Army and Navy trained 24,000 colored soldiers during the war as carpenters. But none of these can gain work in this field because of a ruling on that part of the building trades union.

In the meantime, Russia happily points to such failings whenever we protest her atrocious treatment of her own peoples.

IN 1947

THE NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE, WITH ITS 56 AFFILIATES, ACCOMPLISHED THE FOLLOWING:

Completed 2,021 visits to union headquarters: (a) to cooperate with international and local unions on the development and organization of their educational and social welfare programs; and (b) to advise on and assist with problems involving union membership policy.

Placed 35,536 Negro workers in jobs, many at higher skills and better salaries than previously enjoyed by members of their race.

Placed Negro workers with 1,052 new firms which previously had not used this important source of American labor.

Gave vocational guidance and counseling to 167,660 Negro young people, preparing them for modern careers in the postwar world.

Made 5,593 visits to factories, mills, offices and stores to advise on and assist in the solution of personnel problems.

Gave personal assistance, advice on neighborhood problems, and leadership in group work programs to 740,315 individuals.

Completed a three-year project in community relations, which surveyed racial situations in 13 typical American cities and offered recommendations for improving Negro welfare, reducing racial tension, and increasing community-wide leadership cooperation.

Worked with officials of federal, state and municipal agencies in improving the quality of employment, housing and health, and recreation services to Negro citizens.

IN 1948

THE NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE'S PLANS INCLUDE THE FOLLOWING:

Continuing community studies and advisory services to avert dangers of heightened racial tensions and conflicts.

Working to "remove the racial factor from employment" by encouraging membership discipline among Negro trade unionists, calling the attention of labor leadership to unsound racial situations, and integrating Negro workers harmoniously and efficiently among the ranks of industrial workers.

Supporting programs for better housing, working to break down barriers to adequate health and recreation services, and otherwise tying racial problems in with general problems of community welfare.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

Sometime ago members of the Southern Advisory Committee were contacted relative to the 1948 National Urban League Fund-Raising Campaign. The Quota announced for the Southern Field Division was $50,000.

To date, only a few of the Southern Advisory Committee members have responded to the appeal, and the Southern Field Division is far from its total goal. During these remaining months of 1948 we must initiate a concerted campaign to encourage every possible means of financial support. We appeal to you for your assistance and suggestions.

Would you kindly consider serving as a Committee of One to contact at least five other prospective contributors for the sum of $100.00 each. Also, please send the names and addresses of your five prospects to us so that National Urban League literature can be sent from this office.

We shall count on your help and wise guidance in our fund-raising experience.

To achieve the maximum efficiency in our operations, the counsel and cooperative efforts of the Southern Advisory Committee are of vital importance.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

The National Urban League will hold its 1948 Annual Conference in Richmond, Virginia, September 6th through 10th.

As a member of the Southern Advisory Committee, we are inviting you to meet with us on this occasion and to share in the deliberations of the Conference. Also, it is our feeling that you may like to have the opportunity to see the National Urban League in action and to meet the National and local staff members, the Executive Board members, other Southern Advisory Committee members and Guild members, who are all responsible for the organization's program.

The campus of Virginia Union University, where the Conference will be held, affords a beautiful setting.

We sincerely hope that you will find it possible to be with us. You are certain to enjoy the experience.

For further information and reservations, please contact the Annual Conference Secretary, National Urban League, 1133 Broadway, New York 10, New York, not later than August 6th.

Dear Committee Member:

Enclosed you will find National Urban League Conference materials from the recent meeting in Richmond, Virginia that you might find interesting.

Four of the Southern Advisory Committee members were in attendance: George S. Mitchell, Forrester B. Washington, Edgar Ray and James G. Hanes.

It is the hope of the National Office that a meeting of the Southern Advisory Committee can be called in the not too distant future. Budget limitations have precluded an earlier meeting.

From time to time you will be kept informed of Southern Field operations. At present every effort is being directed toward fund-raising, as the National Urban League is operating currently on a deficit.

Organizational plans for local Leagues still continue in Birmingham and other cities. Winston-Salem has recently employed a person to follow-through on the Community Relations Project made by the National Urban League.

Vacancies for Executives have occurred in New Orleans and Miami. Qualified social workers are being screened at present to fill these vacancies.

Best wishes to you.

76-National Urban League

An American Story

END-OF-THE-YEAR SUMMARY — 1948

NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE • 1133 BROADWAY • NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

This is a typical American Story, the drama of which is possibly more real because it is conveyed in concise, statistics-packed sentences which make no pretense at the grandiloquent. It is a preview to the National Urban League's report of 1948 activities that will come to you in printed form shortly after the first of the year. In accordance with past custom, we are submitting this running account of what we have done -- and why -- and how. It is a reminder to our members and supporters that the demands imposed upon the National Urban League are urgent, continuing, and of vital importance to every citizen of this country.

With a Postscript

We seek again, as is our custom at this time of year, the assurance of your continued support in the form of a contribution now or a pledge that your contribution will be forthcoming on or about the usual date. There is special emphasis to this appeal, for an impending deficit in our 1948 budget not only embarrasses present operations, but also dictates a serious cut in services during 1949 unless financial prospects improve greatly within a short period.

A Symbol and Practical Demonstration

The symbolic and practical significance of the National Urban League as an interracial movement devoted to improving race relations and economic conditions among the Negro population was never better illustrated than during our Annual Conference held last September in Richmond, Virginia. Held on the campus of historic Virginia Union University, the Conference pitched its dates in the midst of a bitter political campaign wherein the issue of civil rights was hotly debated. While the Conference showed full awareness of the importance of this debate, it was remarkable for its objective presentation of social gains as well as losses in the whole race relations picture and its discussion of the specific techniques by which gains may be increased in the future. Richmond's Mayor, the Honorable Horace H. Edwards, joined with Oliver W. Hill, the first and recently elected Negro member of the City Council, in welcoming the Conference. Here, certainly, was an example of the new political South emerging from the murk of past irrational conflict.

"Pilots" for a Working Population in Industry and Commerce

Through the Conference and otherwise, the Industrial Relations Department has reported on its continued and successful efforts to raise the status and improve the performance of Negro workers in American industry and business. Nearly 200 plants and offices received visits and arranged conferences with National Urban League staff, working in partnership with industrial and executive secretaries in local Urban Leagues. In the steadily developing "pilot placement project" of the League, exceptionally trained and experienced young Negroes continued to be placed in professional, technical and supervisory jobs as "pilots" for subsequent entrance and assimilation of larger numbers of their race. There were 50 such applicants enrolled in this project; 24 colleges and universities were used in their recruitment; and 165 industrial commercial firms were contacted for their placement, including Radio Corporation of America, DuPont, Merck Chemicals, General Electric, International Harvester and Babcock and Wilcox. Close relations were maintained with the Foundry Educational Foundation, looking toward on-the-job training of Negro foundry engineers and their employment in the foundry industry.

Know-How and Show-How

Work has gone forward on the Industrial Relations Department's manual on the employment and integration of Negroes in industrial and commercial establishments. This will include a review and analysis of successful experiences in 150 of the major industrial and commercial establishments of the nation. The manual is being prepared under the supervision of the League's Management Advisory Committee -- which in itself is a powerful instrument in developing the League's industrial contacts with top management throughout the nation, for it represents a cross-section of essential industries.

A Significant Change

Increased employment of Negro workers in southern plants on a non-discriminatory basis is the best industrial relations news of 1948, for in the southern region are to be found nearly three-fourths of all Negro labor. Previously these workers have had to migrate northward to find a chance for industrial employment. What is happening in Memphis, Tennessee, Savannah and Atlanta, Georgia, and in some cities of Mississippi and South Carolina is a promise of future opportunity for this typically American labor to find employment outlets without the necessity of migration. This story will be told at greater length in our forthcoming printed annual report.

More Facts and Figures on American Communities

The Research Department, while handling nearly 600 requests received on socio-economic questions affecting Negro life and race relations in general, also carried forward surveys of Negro life and welfare in the communities of Louisville, Kentucky; Muskegon Heights, Michigan; Warren, Ohio; Charleston, West Virginia; and St. Louis, Missouri. A special investigation was also made on the economic and social conditions of Negro workers employed in the resort hotels and inns at White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia.

A Brightening Picture in the South

The day-to-day accomplishments of the Southern Field Office, produced in the face of confusion and turmoil, are also a bright spot in the 1948 Urban League picture. Formal welcome of the newest Urban League affiliate in Jacksonville, Florida; reorganization and restaffing of other southern Urban Leagues; establishment of a professionally-staffed interracial working group in Winston-Salem, North Carolina; beginnings of an Urban League organization in Birmingham, Alabama--these are signs of growing vitality of our interracial movement in that section of the country where it is most desperately needed.

Industrialization of the South's economy is growing rapidly with the location of hundreds of new plants in that area. Concurrent with this is a steadily increasing urbanization of the Negro population. A Southwide Advisory Committee, composed of distinguished Negro and white citizens, has aided and will continue to aid greatly in extending and deepening the influence of the Urban League in that section. Results are already seen in the vocational guidance, health, industrial relations and housing activities of the Southern Field Office. More than 200 high schools and southern colleges were visited by the Southern Field staff to make specific recommendations regarding guidance programs in the schools to aid students in planning and preparing for their careers.

Job Guidance for the Young

Not only in the South, but throughout the nation, the Vocational Guidance program of the National Urban League was carried forward. More than 267,000 young persons were reached in the Vocational Opportunity Campaign from March 14th to 21st. Students in colleges and high schools, veterans, out-of-school youths and adults were contacted at meetings sponsored by sixty cooperating agencies, including local Urban League affiliates, and many of these were white youths and adults. Six hundred and thirty-two major guidance activities were held in 65 schools and colleges reporting on campaign activities. Nearly 65,000 pieces of vocational guidance literature were distributed. One significant end-result of the campaign was the increased interest and skills imparted to school administrators and faculty members and to counselors in schools and community agencies.

We Sell Our Story

In New York City, at the Lincoln Day Dinner of the National and Greater New York Urban Leagues, 561 guests came together in one of the most representative and impressive gatherings of Negro and white citizens in Urban League history. Many out-of-towners were present, including board and staff members of local Leagues. The National Urban League's "Two Friends Award" for outstanding teamwork in the advancement of interracial understanding was made jointly to Branch Rickey and Jackie Robinson of the famous Brooklyn Dodgers. Principal addresses were made by Defense Secretary James Forrestal, Time, Life and Fortune Editor Henry Luce, and Public Opinion Analyst Elmo Roper. Greetings were received from President Truman, New York's Governor Dewey, New York City's Mayor O'Dwyer, and Minneapolis' Mayor Humphrey. A standing ovation was received by former Secretary of War Robert Patterson, and a warm reception was also given Lionel Hampton, well-known band leader.

Another impressive interpretive event was the now celebrated amateur art show, Paintings By Famous Amateurs, promoted by the joint campaign fund of the National and Greater New York Urban Leagues. This exhibit of paintings by famous amateurs was cited by newspaper and magazine editors the country over, as well as by columnists, radio commentators and news analysts. The show, which ended with an auction of the paintings -- all were sold -- was also presented over television and in the newsreels. A canvas by General Dwight D. Eisenhower brought a price of $2,600. Six thousand persons paid admission fees to view the exhibit, more than 800 first-nighters paid $5.00 each to see the show, and the auction rooms on the final night were jammed to the point of suffocation. Co-chairmen of the art show were Mrs. Bennett Cerf and Mrs. Gardner Cowles.

These are only highlights of a year's activities, which included drama and pathos, triumph and failure, hope deferred and success realized. It was a year of tremendous importance for fifteen million Negroes with whose welfare the National Urban League is primarily concerned. Its importance was even greater for the total closely-knit community which is the American nation. Your help in continuing this vital work is earnestly solicited. We are confident that your faith will be justified in the results of our coming year's efforts -- and so our story continues.

26TH ANNUAL REPORT

of the

Tampa Urban League

January

nineteen hundred and forty-nine

FOREWORD

This report represents an effort to review as concisely as possible the work of this agency for the past year. It is in no measure complete. Insomuch as the activities of the Urban League embrace all activities relative to the Negro in our community---it can be plainly understood that perhaps seventy percent of its work is of a highly confidential nature which prohibits public release.

The problem areas of the League are social attitudes, employment, education, health, welfare, recreation and housing.

Its purpose and activities are to improve through social work the living and working conditions of Negroes and to bring about greater cooperation and better understanding between whites and Negroes. The League engages in research and social planning; makes research data available to interested organizations; conducts community surveys; initiates and carries on social work activities until the need is demonstrated and responsibility is assumed by other agencies; gives industrial relations counselling service to employers and labor unions to open employment opportunities to Negro workers; provides vocational guidance counsel to individuals,schools and colleges; offers field service in tension situations; grants fellowships in social work; and gives general information services.

ADMINISTRATION

The Administrative Department promotes, coordinates and supervises the over-all program of the organization. Carries out the directives and the decisions of the Board of Directors pertaining to administration, personnel and programming. Gives guidance and leadership to department heads and staff members for purposes of effectively following through on the League's program and policies. Responsible for planning presentation and control of budget expenditures. Organizes committees for the purpose of interpreting community problems. Plans procedures, methods and techniques for the effective follow-up of the League's programs in view of ever changing social conditions. Attends and works with various types of conferences including social action, professional, welfare and civic pertaining to the organization's over-all program.Fulfills speaking engagements concerning community organization, health, housing, race relations, recreation, group work, crime, delinquency, etc. Writes articles and reports on race relations and economic and social conditions of the community.

PUBLIC RELATIONS

Extensive campaign waged for "Central Village" Negro homes development by the Tampa Daily Times and Urban League.

The League held meetings to discuss restrictions against Negro Housing Expansion Areas in Tampa.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

Mr. George Edwards, National League official visited Executive Secretary in connection with Vocational Guidance Week.

The Executive Secretary has conferred with officials on employment problems at the Drew Field Sanitorium. The Urban League Industrial Department has taken over personnel at this institution.

The League joined the Florida State Employment Service in the recent drive to employ the physically handicapped. The League especially urged colored employers to bear some of the load where possible.

COMMUNITY RELATIONS

The Urban League accepted gifts from a Tampa Church, the Salvation Army and others to be distributed to indigent children. Three Christmas Tree parties served over 1000 children.

Permission for use of an office serving as headquarters for the Negro Chamber of Commerce granted.

VETERAN SERVICES

Worked closely with American Legion and American Veterans Committee in connection with Urban League's Veteran program.

EDUCATION

Transportation secured for Spastic Classes through Urban League, courtesy of Mr. Frank Carnalla (Way Cab).

The Urban League worked with the Citizens Committee on Education for the betterment of our school system throughout the State.

County Industrial Home for Negro boys and girls dedicated.

RACE RELATIONS

The Race Relations Committee called by the chairman, met and prepared the program for the presentation of our "Annual Award" to the person making the greatest contribution toward interracial understanding during 1947. The recipient was selected.

HEALTH

The Executive attended the Polio Fund meeting at Tuskegee Institute and played an important part in raising funds for the 1948 Polio Drive.

The Tampa Urban League provided the building, facilities and the students for the 1948 Class of Nurses' Aides which numbered 17.

COMMUNITY PLANNING

Urban League formed committee for proposed Negro Branch Y. M.C.A. for Tampa. The late Mrs. M.E.Potter bequeathed property for this purpose.

The Urban League recommended the appointment of Negro Deputy Sheriffs in Hillsborough County.

FINANCE

The Leon Claxton "Harlem in Havana" donated the entire proceeds from a performance for the Urban League's annual drive. We expressed our thanks in the form of an inscribed award to Mr. Claxton and his company. We also thank Mr. Singletary of the local theatre and the corporation for their loan of the theatre free of any expense.

Dr. George S. Mitchell
Executive Director
Southern Regional Council
63 Auburn Avenue - Room 432
Atlanta 3, Georgia

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

I am writing you in regard to a proposed South-wide Conference to be held in Atlanta about the first week-end in May, which would include executives and a board member from each League, as well as members of the South-wide Advisory Committee and probably additional persons, for a two-day session.

In preparation for the Conference, I should like to suggest that we might work out a Planning Committee, centered around Atlanta, which would include the executive of the Atlanta Urban League, the president or a designated person from the Atlanta Urban League, the members of the South-wide Advisory Committee who are in Atlanta, and representation from the Southern Field Staff.

The purposes of such a meeting are numerous. Among them are:

1. To determine the relationship between the Southern Field Division and the National Office on one hand, and Southern Affiliates on the other; and to discover what kind of Southern Regional Office would be most helpful to Southern Affiliates in assisting to develop program emphases. The latter implies what Urban League program is and what it should be in the Southern region.

2. The program of the Southern Field Division Office requires affiliate participation in a careful definition of objectives. It is hoped that such a conference might develop such a definition.

Contributions to the National Urban League are deductible for income tax purposes

3. The problem of strengthening the Advisory Committee to bring it into a full and effective operating group as a Regional Committee is of importance. The question of responsibility for League work in the South and participation in the National Board is suggested for discussion.

4. Methods are needed for securing greater participation for League program - national and local - as well as means for developing joint operations where mutually desirable and advantageous.

I should like to call together representatives of this group on next Monday, March 14, at 11 o'clock in my office, 250 Auburn Avenue - Suite 602, to discuss preliminary plans. I hope you can find it possible to attend.

Cordially yours,

Nelson C. Jackson

March
Eighteenth 1949

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

For several years in the National Urban League, we have been working to strengthen and expand our operations in the southern region. The last three years have seen a change in the exeuctive direction of our Southern Field Division at Atlanta, increase in number and staff and in size of budget, and an encouraging stepping-up of our program activities throughout the South.

The time has come to take a good look at ourselves and determine how this improvement process can be accelerated and in what ways the Urban League movement can best fulfill its important function in the South. This is not a question that can be decided in New York City. It calls for the wisdom of our Southwide Advisory Committee, recently organized, combined with the counsel of the Presidents and Executives of our local Urban Leagues in your region.

For this reason, we are contemplating the holding of a Southwide Conference of Urban League leadership, to be held in Atlanta, Georgia, on the campus of Atlanta University the week-end of May 5th, 6th and 7th (Thursday, Friday and Saturday). Sucha conference will mean very little unless there is practically 100% representation of our local Leagues in southern states and a good strong attendance of our Southwide Advisory Committee.

This letter is, therefore, a direct request to you as a member of the Southwide Advisory Committee to be present in the event that conference plans are carried through. In addition, we are asking the Board Chairman and Executives of the Leagues in the southern field to attend.

This brings up the financial question, We are operating this year on a reduced budget, as all local Urban Leagues have been informed. Plans for the Conference are not included in that budget. We are hoping that the local Leagues will be able to finance the travel costs of their representatives and that some way will be found to underwrite the total cost of such a conference. We have an opportunity and a challenge unparalleled in our history. Our conference is for the purpose of helping us to face that challenge squarely and effectively.

Will you let me hear from you at the earliest possible moment so that we may proceed with our plan?

Sincerely,

Lloyd K. Garrison

VOC

BIBLIOGRAPHY

(March 1949)

This brief bibliography has been prepared as a program aid for schools and community groups participating in the National Urban League's Vocational Opportunity Campaign. It is by no means extensive, but is representative of recent literature. The references are suggested for teachers, counselors, teacher-counselors, community organization workers and others who have responsibilities in connection with the VOC. Some of the books listed will be helpful to VOC speakers and resource consultants.

I JOBS AND OCCUPATIONS

YOUR JOB: A Guide to Opportunity and Security. Fritz Kaufman. Harper and Brothers, New York, 1948. $2.75
Discusses planning to make a living, where people work, and what they do, how to find, hold and progress in a job, etc. For adults, and young adults, as well as for vocational advisers.

I FIND MY VOCATION. Harry D. Kitson. McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc., New York, 1947. Revised edition. $1.80
Gives students an understanding of the steps required in choosing a field of work, and the vocational problems which must be solved. Projects and exercises outlined. Bibliographies, including suggestions on visual aid and biographies. For junior high and high school students.

HOW TO FIND THE RIGHT VOCATION. Harry D. Kitson. New York, Harper and Brothers, 1947. Revised edition. $2.50
Describes the steps to take in choosing a vocation. For high school students and young adults.

METHODS OF VOCATIONAL GUIDANCE. Gertrude Forrester. D. C. Heath and Company, Boston, 1944.
Counseling program aids for teachers and teacher-counselors. Designed specifically for school use in institutions that do not have full-time vocational counselors. Programs adaptable to community agency use. For vocational advisers.

GUIDE TO OCCUPATIONAL CHOICE AND TRAINING: Suggestions, Books and Materials for Guidance Programs. Walter J. Greenleaf. Vocational Division Bulletin No. 236, Occupational Information and Guidance Series No, 15. Federal Security Agency, U. S. Office of Education, 1947. (Secure from Superintendent of Documents, U. S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. 35¢)
An excellent bibliography of source materials. Many free materials on occupations listed. Part I is a good discussion on use of occupational materials in guidance programs. For advisers.

II BACKGROUND SOURCES OF INFORMATION ON THE NEGRO IN AMERICAN LIFE

BLACK ODYSSEY: The Story of the Negro in America. Roi Ottley. Charles Scribners Sons, New York, 1948. $3.50
Traces the history of the Negro in America. Many references to occupations and occupational achievement, as well as brief sketches of outstanding citizens. For adult readers.

AN AMERICAN DILEMMA: The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy. Gunnar Myrdal. Harper and Brothers, New York, 1944. 1 volume $6.00
A comprehensive report on the Negro in American society. Sections on Economics, the Negro School, the Negro Wage Earner, tables, charts and bibliographies especially recommended. For speakers and resource consultants.

THE NEGRO IN AMERICA. Maxwell S. Stewart. Public Affairs Pamphlet #95. Public Affairs Committee, Inc., 22 East 38th Street, New York 16, N.Y. 20¢.
A summary of An American Dilemma. Statistical and factual information for easy use. Recommended for high school and college students, as well as for the general reader.

THE NEGRO HANDBOOK: 1946-47. Florence Murray. Current Books, Inc., New York, 1947.
Review of the Negro in American life for the years indicated. Covers fields of population, civil rights, health, labor and industry, education, housing, etc. For general use.

THE NEGRO YEAR BOOK. Jessie Parkhurst Guzman, Ed. Tuskegee Institute, Alabama. 1947 Tenth Edition.
Comprehensive review of events affecting Negro life between 1941 and 1946. For general use.

Bibliographies

RACE RELATIONS: A Selected List of Readings on Racial and Cultural Minorities in the United States with Special Emphasis on the Negro. Julia Waxman. Julius Rosenwald Fund, Chicago, Illinois, 1945.

SOURCES OF INSTRUCTIONAL MATERIALS ON NEGROES. Ambrose Caliver. (Revised by Theresa B. Wilkins). The National Education Association of the United States, 1201 16th Street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

III THE NEGRO IN INDUSTRY

ALL MANNER OF MEN. Malcolm Ross. Reynal and Hitchcock, New York, 1948. $3.50
Factual information on the Federal government's experience with the National Fair Employment Practices Committee. Discussion of methods of establishing and maintaining fair employment practices. For speakers and resource consultants.

NEGRO LABOR: A National Problem. Robert C. Weaver. Harcourt Brace and Company, New York, 1946. $3.00
Outlines what happened to Negro labor during the war years and what racial problems will face workers and management in the postwar. For teachers, vocational advisers, speakers and resource consultants.

INFORMATION TO EDITOR

A Vocational Opportunity Kit containing educational and guidance literature to aid in the counselling of Negro youth is being mailed from the office of the National Urban League, 1133 Broadway, New York City, to 500 schools, colleges, cooperating agencies and 56 local Urban Leagues. Special guidance leaflets and a pamphlet, Program Aids for counselors, material for speakers and career leaflets are included in the kit.

Among this material are three specially-designed program aids: a comic booklet, Fair Play; a VOC Bibliography giving specific sources of job information and data on the Negro in American life; and Quiz-VOC a two page leaflet of 50 questions designed to stimulate interest in occupations.

This material is being mailed in anticipation of the National Urban League's Vocational Opportunity Campaign Week, March 14-21, directed to Negro youth with the slogan, "The Future is Yours--Plan and Prepare!" The Campaign is directed from the National Urban League by Miss Ann Tanneyhill, Director of Vocational Guidance assisted in the South by George Edwards, Assistant Director of the Southern Field Division, 250 Auburn Avenue,N.E., Atlanta, Georgia.

I want to take this opportunity to thank you for a splendid setting for our Southern Regional Conference of the National Urban League.

There were many statements regarding the fact that that sort of presentation was absolutely necessary, and as you remember, throughout the Conference, there were opportunities to refer to your excellent presentation.

Again, I thank you.

Dear Mr. Granger:

Here is a brand new pamphlet--one we have been trying for a good while to get completed.

We think it is really going to do a lot of good. The Southern Newspaper Publishers Association has agreen to send it out to all its members.

My next job is to get it into the hands of newspaper readers so that they, running a sort of audit of the local papers against the little green book, can push through some changes.

We strained our credit to get it printed, and we are anxious to sell blocks of it to help pay the printer's bill. I know the Urban League is not rich. Who is, these days? But, won't you consider whether you have any device to help us.

a. Pay the printer's bill
b. Get the pamphlet into Southern hands.

We sell the pamphlet for fifteen cents a copy.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell
Executive Director

Dear Colleague:

We are sharing with you a report of the activities of the Southern Field Division during 1949. We are hopeful that 1950 will be a prosperous one, both in terms of program development, financial support and the support of our many friends about the country.

We are particularly anxious that members of the South-wide Advisory Committee be of greater support to the National Urban League during the coming year.

We appreciate your comments and suggestions for greater service during 1950.

Cordially yours,

Nelson C. Jackson

NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE

MEMORANDUM April 12, 1950

To: Mr. Lester B. Granger
League Executives
South-wide Advisory Committee Members

From: Nelson C. Jackson
Southern Field Director

Subject: ACTIVITIES OF THE SOUTHERN FIELD DIVISION
National Urban League
During 1949

INTRODUCTION

During 1949, the Southern Field Division was able to move forward on several fronts and to strengthen its program in several areas. Notable among the strengths were the participation and cooperation of the many League Executives, board and staff members, and South-wide Advisory Committee representatives in the South. Their support is appreciated and hoped for for the future.

Staff-wise the Southern Field Division suffered during 1949. Miss Isobel Chisholm left the staff in February, after having organized Guilds in six of our Southern League cities. The interpretation which she made rated continued development during 1949. We were, however, able to secure the services of Miss Earlene Wright on a part-time basis until June. She followed through on activities of the Fund-raising Campaign of the Southern Field Division and assisted in doing the Proceedings of the First Annual Conference. She left the office to accept the position as Executive of the Fort Worth Urban League after that time.

Mr. George L. Edwards was the recipient of a Fellowship from the General Education Board to do advanced work in Vocational Guidance at Columbia University. He worked all of 1949 and secured a leave of absence in February of 1950 until June. He will return to the office after that time for advanced activities in the area of Vocational Guidance.

SERVICE TO AFFILIATES

The following Affiliates were visited during 1949: New Orleans, Louisiana; Oklahoma City, Oklahoma; Fort Worth, Texas; Jacksonville, Tampa and Miami, Florida; and Atlanta, Georgia. And in connection with a part-time field work responsibility with the Atlanta University School of Social Work, Chicago, Cleveland, Baltimore and New York were visited.

In New Orleans, Oklahoma City and Fort Worth, field consultation visits served to strengthen Board, Chest and Council relations, as well as to assist with program planning. In the afore-mentioned Leagues, new life was noted in the development of activities which should make for stronger program during 1950.

In Jacksonville, a program for veterans participated in by Mr. George Holland was noted as being one of the best in the country, according to Mr. Holland's report. Notable accomplishments in the several Leagues might be mentioned as the completion of plans for the erection of a swimming pool and the assurance that Negro police would be employed in Jacksonville.

Housing activities in Miami and Atlanta served to highlight the activities of Leagues in those areas. In addition, the beginning of a 100-bed Negro private hospital in Atlanta, Georgia can be traced directly to the activities of the Atlanta Affiliate.

In Fort Worth, the Board was re-organized and community programs started in the several areas of Fort Worth.

Similarly, the Oklahoma City Urban League received an increase in its budget from the local Chest and was able during the year to strengthen its program in child welfare services and to secure active participation by a large number of lay persons on committees working in the interest of the organization activities.

Memphis, Tennessee; Little Rock, Arkansas and Richmond, Virginia were not visited officially during the year. Contact, however, was maintained with the Memphis Affiliate by correspondence and the Richmond and Little Rock Executives were in attendance at the First Southern Regional Conference of the National Urban League held in Atlanta during the month of May. In each instance, however, it can be reported that programs in their local communities have been carried on of credit to the movement. The Memphis Urban League, for example, has been able to pull in good press support for its programs, worked closely with the International Harvester Plant in Memphis, and was able to secure support for the appointment of Negroes to the Tennessee Employment Service. All three of these Affiliates will be visited during 1950.

Field Memos

In addition to the visits made to local Affiliates and correspondence exchanged, several memorandums were sent to local Leagues in an attempt to assist in the development of their respective programs. Among such memos were: Suggestions regarding employment opportunities in Federal Housing; Race in the News, a description of a pamphlet done by the Southern Regional Council and which could be used to strengthen public relations; attention called to "Our Home Town" by Earle Lippincott, a resource book which aids in the development of noting community resources and suggestions regarding program development; Your community six-point employment program; request for assistance in securing Negroes on Governors' committees for the forthcoming Mid-Century White House Conference, and a proposal regarding the Regional Conference of the National Urban League. In practically every instance local Leagues followed through with information sent from the Regional Office.

NEW LEAGUE PROSPECTS

During 1949, numerous League prospects came to the attention of the Southern Field Division. Some were worked on, others were noted as correspondence contacts for the present. Among those communities requesting visits to work toward planning Leagues were: Durham, North Carolina; Charlottesville, Virginia and Dallas, Texas. In each of the instances above mentioned, visits were promised during 1950.

In addition, Mr. Jerome B. Johnson, of the National Office, while doing a check on Community Relations Project cities, noted interest in Tulsa, Oklahoma; Houston, Texas and St. Petersburg, Florida. While no additional Leagues were organized in the Southern Field area during 1949, the following cities were visited:

Winston-Salem

As a culmination of months of correspondence in advising the Executive Secretary of the Community Relations Project - an organization set up after the National Urban League made the survey in Winston-Salem - I was invited to participate as the annual speaker for the organization in October. At this time the Chairman of the Board of the organization, Mr. James Hanes, indicated his interest in affiliating with the National Urban League; and Mr. Harry L. Alston, the Executive Secretary, is working very closely with him toward completing the affiliation agreement. The Community Relations Project, however, has been able to do an excellent job along program lines of the National Urban League during its year of operation.

Birmingham

Numerous visits were made to Birmingham, Alabama during 1949. Although money was raised for one-half of the budget among white citizens, a stalemate occurred in organizational attempts because of the un-democratic approach by some of the white citizens, and this city has to be removed from the active list - for organizational purposes - for the present. A special report on Birmingham is in the hands of the Executive Director.

Houston

I made visits to Houston, Texas in February and April. In addition, correspondence was carried on between the Southern Field Office and key persons in Houston. One of the problems in Houston, as cited by leading white and Negro citizens, is the fact that there is no one Negro leader who has community support. Similarly, the white community is divided into several economic camps which affect the community's social service program. Finally, the Community Fund Drive was not successful in Houston during 1949, and it was thought best not to develop plans for bringing a new organization in because of the latter condition. The Council Director, however, agreed to work cooperatively with the Southern Field Division and partially as a result of Mr. Jerome Johnson's visit in November, plans were laid for a visit to Houston during the early part of 1950 to further League organization plans.

Shreveport, Louisiana; Nashville and Chattanooga, Tennessee were visited in connection with other program activities. Each seemed to present the need for Urban League program. There was interest expressed during my Shreveport visit, but no follow-up in the community resulted. Chattanooga, Tennessee has developed an interracial program of great significance. It, however, has not expressed a willingness for the organization of a League branch, although the Graduate Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity indicated that it would take the Urban League organization project as its program. While Nashville, Tennessee has exhibited some interest in planning for bringing the Urban League to that community, it was not found possible to develop latent interest among key citizens to the point where activities could be developed.

PROGRAM AND ADMINISTRATIVE ACTIVITIES

First Annual Southern Regional Conference

The First Annual Southern Regional Conference of the National Urban League was held in Atlanta, Georgia in May 1949. Fifty-two persons attended the Conference, comprising Executive Secretaries, members of boards of local Affiliates, representatives of the South-wide Advisory Committee, Chest and Council Executives and students and faculty from the Atlanta University School of Social Work. Conference Proceedings were processed and sent to the League Executives and persons attending the meeting.

A Committee on Resolutions to the Southern Regional Conference of the National Urban League made specific recommendations. Resolutions and what has happened as a result since is herewith presented.

2. BE IT RESOLVED, that this type of workshop be continued annually, et cetera, et cetera.

   Comment: The Conference could not be scheduled for 1950 due to the lack of personnel in the Southern Field Office and funds to carry on the activity.

3. BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, that the Southern Field Division appoint a Committee on Finance to study and recommend methods by which the local Leagues might give more financial support to the National Urban League and that such recommendations be discussed at the next Annual Conference of the National Urban League.

   Comment: Fund-raising was not scheduled as a part of the Southern Field Division's program at the National Conference. However, plans for fund-raising in the South have been discussed with the Executive Director from time to time, with plans suggested for tying in the Southern area more closely with fund-raising operations on a national scale.

4. BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, that the Southern Field Division request the National Urban League to create a Fellowship to the Atlanta University School of Social Work, et cetera.

   Comment: In a memorandum from Mr. Maurice Moss to Mr. Kinckle Jones on October 25, 1949, the following is reported:

   "It was resolved at the Conference, the Southern Field Division request the National Urban League create a Fellowship to the Atlanta University School of Social Work, et cetera.

   "This resolution was handed in to the Resolutions

Committee at the Denver Conference:

'After considerable deliberation, the Denver Conference Resolutions Committee decided not to include this among the resolutions which it brought to the floor of the Conference.'

"As I recall the discussion, there were two major considerations leading to this decision: (1) That the resolution named a particular school of social work and apparently assumed that the school would cooperate in the plan, whereas the Committee felt that such an undertaking should result from negotiation between the League and the school, without a formal resolution coming from the Conference, and (2) That the resolution ran counter to long established policy in that it would name the recipient to be employed by the League.

"It was my impression in the discussion, that there was sympathetic understanding of the intent of this resolution and that its rejection hinged around the method of starting negotiations rather than around the idea itself.

"I pass this on to you for whatever it may be worth to you and the Fellowship Committee."

5. BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, that more consideration be given to the placement of prominent Southerners on the Board of Trustees of the National Urban League, et cetera, et cetera.

Comment: This resolution was taken up at Denver and as a result local Leagues over the country have made recommendations to the National Office for key persons to be placed on the Board of the National Urban League.

National Social Welfare Assembly Institute

The subject of the Conference was "The Field Worker and the Rural Community." It was held at the Parish House of All Saints Church in Atlanta, Georgia July 11-14.

I served as a member of the Planning Committee for this Conference, beginning in January, where a group of about twenty-five representatives of regional agencies met in Atlanta to talk over the possibilities of having an Institute some time in the summer which would concern itself with field work in the rural community. The National Urban League was the only organization interested in the program of social welfare among Negroes represented. When the Institute was held, forty-two representatives of agencies in the National Social Welfare Assembly attended the meeting. The conference participants believed that there should be a continuation of this idea, particularly to see that representatives of agencies got to know one another better and to make plans to do a better job in the South. It was agreed also that there should be representatives of lay groups which would bring the thinking closer to the people who are served and that another conference should be kept in mind. At the summary session on Thursday morning following the conference, there were some charges brought that the conference was mis-labeled and should have been called an "Institute for Racial Integration." This charge was made by the American Red Cross representatives. They also charged that there was a bias in the finance phase of the program in that representatives of federated financing were presented only. Despite these charges, it was agreed that the conference was good and that it should be carried on another year. In the light of the overwhelming request for the conference, a conference for 1950 was planned, and will be participated in by the National Urban League.

Mid-Century White House Conference on Children and Youth

The Leagues in the Southern Field Division were alerted during the month of September regarding the proposed organization of Governors' Committees for the 1950 Mid-Century White House Conference on Children and Youth. League Executives were asked to use their influence with their Governors to see that Negroes were appointed to the committees in their states. As a result of League Executives activities and members of their Boards and through assistance of other interested persons, practically every Southern State has appointed Negroes to State-wide Committees. In Tennessee, Arkansas, Oklahoma and Louisiana, League Executives are members of Governors' Committees. Georgia is one of the two states which so far have refused to appoint Negroes, although I did receive a letter from Governor Talmadge appointing me, which invitation was later withdrawn - not directly but through his State Chairman.

Conferences have been held in Washington with representatives of the Children's Bureau and the White House Conference staff; and a committee working in Georgia is attempting to remedy the Georgia situation.

Board of Control for Southern Regional Education

I was invited as one of two Negroes to explore the problem of social work planning in the South and to make recommendations for graduate studies and meeting needs in the field. This conference, which met in Atlanta for two days - November 6 and 7 - and had as representatives directors of schools of social work in the South as well as representatives of the Board of Control for Southern Regional Education, made recommendation to the Southern Governors meeting in Biloxi, Mississippi, November 21. A resolution was presented by the Negro representatives which finally, after revision, was accepted to wit:

> "The Commission wishes to commend the Board of Control for Southern Regional Education for the position it has taken in the Maryland Case in stating that 'It is not the purpose of the Board that the Regional Compact and the contract for educational services thereunder shall serve any state as a legal defense for avoiding responsibilities established or defined under the existing State and Federal Laws and court decisions.'"

Housing Conferences

Two significant housing conferences were attended during 1949. The first was the 1949 Economy Housing Program Conference held at the Henry Grady Hotel on February 15, 1949, where a statement was prepared by the Atlanta Advisory Committee on the Economy Housing program of housing for Negroes in the Atlanta area. This statement prepared by a committee working under the chairmanship of W. H. Aiken, received the acclaim of the Housing Conference and was used as the basis for planning for housing for Negroes in the City of Atlanta.

The second conference attended was held at Prairie View State College, Prairie View, Texas - the third annual housing conference called at that college - to discuss methods of building for low-income groups. My assignment was to discuss the source of labor supply in the South. This conference, attended by representatives from various departments in Washington, the Regional Housing offices in Texas as well as builders and contractors from the Southwestern Region, agreed in conference to make recommendation to the Land Grant College Presidents regarding course offerings in the building trades in an attempt to strengthen curriculums and bridge the gap between training courses and employment in the field. In addition, definite recommendations were made regarding building for low-income groups.

Numerous contacts were maintained between the Regional FHA Office Racial Relations Advisers and Public Housing Administrative Offices.

FUND-RAISING ACTIVITIES

Of significance during 1949 was the first fund-raising attempt made in Atlanta, Georgia under the able leadership of Mr. W. H. Aiken, president of the National Builders Association. A goal was set for $10,000. Some difficulties were noted where the proposed organization did not come up to expectations, but despite difficulties the Southern Field Division was able to raise approximately $5,000 in this activity.

The National Shriners were visited in their convention in Detroit to follow through on the grant which was made the year previously at St. Louis, which amounted to approximately $750. It is expected that the cooperation of the Masonic bodies among Negroes can be secured and that sustaining grants will be forthcoming after a period of interpretation, and the further development of good public relations.

The first week in April, I was invited to speak before the Louisiana State Federation of Labor through Dr. George Snowden, vice president of this organization and a member of the New Orleans Urban League Board. This initial contact is to be followed up during 1950 with a special pamphlet pointed toward the Urban League's cooperation with organized labor and work on Dr. Snowden's part to secure cooperation between the Louisiana State Federation of Labor and the National Urban League in its fund-raising attempts.

Mr. Cornelius Maiden, vice-president of the Alabama Federation of Labor, has suggested that a visit can possibly be worked out so that I might be able to speak before the Alabama Federation of Labor during 1950. Plans are being laid in this direction.

Fund-raising discussions were held with the National Office in an attempt to tie the Southern Field Division more closely into planning for national emphasis. The necessity for this consideration cannot be too strongly stressed. Whenever the limited staff in the Southern Field Office has to take time out for fund-raising activities program suffers.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

During 1949, Mr. George L. Edwards was requested to find out the number of new plants which had come into the Atlanta region during the last year and to visit as many of those plants as possible to ascertain what their employment practices were in relation to the employment of Negroes. It was found that twenty-three new industries, mainly representative of national industries, had come to Atlanta during 1948, and nineteen additional industries had purchased land in anticipation of building. Elsewhere about the South, a report done by the National Planning Association Committee of the South reports that there has been a tremendous drive toward industrialization in this section of the United States. (A separate memo was sent to the Executive Director on November 4, 1949 citing industrial changes and requesting that the National Office give some consideration immediately to the employment of industrial relations personnel for the Southern Field. This is a job which must be done on the scene for best results. The present staff cannot cover this area of operation without having to let other operations go by default.

PUBLIC RELATIONS

The job of public relations has been divided within the office since the Promotion and Publicity Secretary position was cut from the staff. A limited volume of news copy has been sent to the press, covering activities of the Southern Field Division. I serve as a member of the Executive Committee and the Board of the American Association of Social Workers, the Association for the Study of Community Organization, as well as hold numerous board positions in the Southern area in social welfare organizations. This helps to interpret the work of the Urban League in the section. In addition, as a member of the Masonic bodies and the Elks in Atlanta, a wider public is gained for the operations of the organization. In the 1949 Convention of the Shrine in Detroit, the Souvenir Program carried a two-page reproduction of the Certificate of Recognition given by the National Urban League to the Imperial Potentate. As a result of this and other activities, I have been requested to prepare articles - and have done so - for the official publication, THE PYRAMID.

VOCATIONAL GUIDANCE

Mr. George Edwards, Assistant Southern Field Director, worked with Urban League Affiliates, Secondary Schools and Colleges, State Departments of Education, Parent-Teacher Associations and the Southern Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools for Negroes in organizing Vocational Guidance Councils and perfecting a working relationship between Leagues, Councils, schools and educational officials. In Jacksonville, Florida, he assisted in the organization of an industrial relations committee which concerned itself with the vocational adjustment problems of that city. As a result, a working relationship was established with the Stanton High School in the expansion of the School's informational Bureau on job opportunities and employment trends. A similar trip was made in Miami, Florida.

He assisted in the organization and participated in career conferences at the Booker T. Washington High School, Atlanta, Georgia. Growing out of those conferences the Southern Field Division has been contacted by approximately 600 individual senior students for specific information on job opportunities and employment trends and advice on procedures for preparing for future employment. Administered 398 Job Interest Indicators to students of Booker T. Washington and David T. Howard High Schools and Clark College. The results and interpretation of these Indicators are being used as the basis for a more realistic counseling program within the respective institutions.

The Assistant Director circularized more than 1200 high schools in the thirteen Southern States regarding the importance of funcrional guidance programs and the concern of the National Urban League in the vocational adjustment problems of Negroes. Field trips were made to Albany State College, Albany, Georgia; Center High School, Waycross, Georgia; Bethune-Cookman College, Daytona Beach, Florida; Fort Valley State College, Fort Valley, Georgia and Georgia State College, Savannah, Georgia in the interest of vocational guidance.

The Southern Field Division for the second year cooperated with the U. S. Navy in the promotion of the Navy ROTC program as a facet of the League's concern with the vocational adjustment problems of youth. Mr. Edwards assisted the Personnel Department of the Navy in bringing before 8,500 male students in 32 Negro colleges and high schools information pertaining to the Navy ROTC program. As a result of conferences with Navy officials, the ROTC examinations were given on a non-segregated basis in Atlanta and New Orleans.

A field trip was made to New Orleans with Lt. Dennis Nelson, of the U. S. Navy, in the interest of the N ROTC program. As a result, 150 students made applications in the five schools visited in that city, and the New Orleans area registered the highest number of Negro candidates for the examinations in the thirteen Southern States and the District of Columbia.

According to reports from Navy sources, Elmer St. Elmo Dupre, 17 year old New Orleans high school youth, was the only Negro from a Southern state and one of the two Negroes in the nation to pass the N ROTC examination.

CONCLUSION

The Southern Field operation has moved ahead in many areas during 1949. Two firsts were noted in connection with the First Annual Southern Regional Conference and the first major campaign for the National Urban League in the South. Both were indicative of the need for continued emphasis, but cannot be continued without money and staff. This is important also in connection with the need for entering the field of industrial relations. If the Southern operation is to move ahead, it must approach the field of industrial relations with personnel employed in the Southern Field Office. Prior to that time, however, it is hoped that some preliminary visits can be made by a staff member of the National Office to ascertain trends in the employment of Negroes and program areas suggested.

Dear Nelson:

I went to the largish Rural Life Conference at Tuskegee the other day. Many of the Negroes there had driven from considerable distances, and from two or three I had dismal tales of discriminations and insults at filling stations which they stopped at along the way.

This is an old story, but I thought maybe it was time to make some concerted push on this. Atlanta probably contains regional offices for a good many of the chains, and something might be done.

Would it be a good plan for you and me to work together?

I found in my inquiries that independent stations generally had a bad name for courtesy, but, when it came to the chains, experience varied greatly. Some people swore by Sinclair, some people swore by Esso, and others swore at both.

Dear George:

A Round Table - "Guidance and Training in a Free America" - co-sponsored by the National Urban League and Atlanta University, will be held at Atlanta University on April 5, 1951. Since a majority of the League Executives in the Southern Field, as well as board members, have indicated that much value could be received by having a Regional Conference in Atlanta this spring, it is planned to hold that Conference on April 6 and 7.

The purpose of the Round Table on "Guidance and Training in a Free America," which is a part of the 40th Anniversary celebration, will be keyed to the present national emergency and the nation's need for the cooperation of all institutions in the mobilization and utilization of available manpower. Serving as a liaison between government, industry and educational institutions, the National Urban League, through this Round Table, will give opportunity for administrators and faculty of Negro schools and colleges in the South to discuss with important representatives of key agencies:

a. The present emergency and its impact on guidance and training; and

b. Long-ranged aspects of guidance and training.

Regional Conference

A brief statement of the purpose of the Regional Conference would be to provide an opportunity for League representatives in the South to meet and discuss problems relative to the present national emergency and to discuss among ourselves the various facets of problems which we face in this critical period.

The Conference will be held at the Trevor Arnett Library of Atlanta University. Housing and food can be secured at the Atlanta University Dormitory at a cost of $4 to $5 per day. Since the dates had to be changed, because of commitments at the University, to this earlier date, will you please indicate immediately whether or not you will be able to attend.

Preliminary statements regarding program will be sent out, including assignments, in the next week or so to make this a worthwhile conference.

Will you indicate what the most pressing problem in connection with the national emergency is with you, as it relates to Urban League operation, so that it will be helpful in the planning of program.

The Regional Conference is to include members of Boards and staffs of Southern Leagues.

Cordially yours,

Nelson

Southern Field Director.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

As secretaries in the offices of the National Urban League, we have offered our help in raising funds to carry on the work of our organization. As a friend of the League, we don't have to remind you that the League is the only national organization with a professionally led program aimed at broadening the economic horizon of the Negro population. And we're convinced that it is doing the outstanding job in this field.

We are, therefore, "secretaries for a cause" - and in addition to the day-to-day responsibilities of our jobs we feel a moral obligation to the organization and the cause to which it is dedicated. We solicit your help in our efforts, for in helping us you are giving your endorsement to the objectives of the National Urban League and aiding in forwarding its program.

As our major fund-raising effort this year, we plan to have a dance at the Royal Manor, here in New York, on Saturday, May third. In connection with this event we are getting together a Patrons List of special friends of the League - and we're anxious to include your name on the printed program. Patrons are asked to donate Five ($5.00) Dollars.

We are happy to report that last year, with the cooperation of the secretaries in our 58 local affiliates, we raised $3,000 through a dime-project and presented this amount to the League at the Annual Conference in St. Paul. We are sure that with your cooperation we can raise a similar sum this year.

The enclosed statement will give you an idea of what others have had to say about us. We look forward to your favorable reply and hope for your continued interest.

Very truly yours,
Enid C. Baird

What They Say.....

About THE ADMINISTRATIVE AND CLERICAL COUNCIL

"No gift to the League in a long time has so deeply touched me as this one, coming as it does from the young ladies who work in our offices as secretaries, stenographers and receptionists. This evidence of their devotion 'over and beyond the call of duty' is probably the finest evidence of the acceptance of our program which we could have. Financially it is a significant gift, but it is even more significant as a symbol."

... Lloyd K. Garrison, NUL President (acknowledging $3,000 contribution from the Council, September, 1951)

"Having had the privilege and pleasure of working at one time on a special project in the office of the NUL, I know what a hardworking, cooperative, swell group of people its staff members are. This takes in everyone, from the receptionist to the executive secretary, Lester Granger, who, I wish to add, is a truly 'wonderful guy' . . . So, it is with pleasure that I have the privilege of announcing in this column the public debut of the Administrative and Clerical Council of the NUL ... "

... Edward G. Perry, Columnist
New York Amsterdam News

"The NUL Secretarial Contest will reveal some very startling facts about fund-raising... The girls, scattered throughout the country, linked with the various Urban League branches, had loads of fun aiding the worthy cause. Now I know why everyone is saying that those very same Girl Fridays are the best to be had. It must be wonderful to know that when you're a hard worker that you are a good worker and also that your (best) efforts are highly appreciated. . . The League wants this space to take time out to say to all the girls (Secretaries, that is): 'Well done!' "

... Ted Yates, Columnist
Independent Press Service

"I very much like the idea of the secretarial staff (which really does all the work done in all offices anyway) striking out on its own. Good for you folks!"

... Roger William Riis,
NUL Board Member.

"Nothing I can think of is so satisfying as to see so many people working together towards the implementing of an important principle. Not to be left out, I'm taking the liberty of sending you my check to cover the cost of a table at your May 20th Cocktail Dance. Good luck to you!"

... Miss Beatrice J. Platt,
Secretary to Mr. Dwight R. G. Palmer, General Cable Corporation.

"The outstanding feature of the NUL Conference was the recognition given the administration secretaries. During my 24 years with the League I do not recall a more impressive event than the crowning of the 'Secretary of the Year' and the presentation of the contribution to Mr. Lloyd Garrison."

... Edward S. Lewis, Executive Director
Urban League of Greater New York

"I wish to commend you upon the work that you are doing with the Administrative and Clerical Council. I think that staff workers' participation in this Council and the attendance at the conference means as much to them in their sphere of the work as it does to professional workers in our sphere."

... J. Westbrook McPherson, Exec. Dir.
New Orleans Urban League

"The Administrative and Clerical Council is doing a wonderful job. The National Office and the whole League movement are indebted to you girls for the tangible and praiseworthy work being promoted by the Council."

... Clifford E. Minton, Exec. Secy.
Urban League of Gary

"Best of luck to the Council. It is an excellent idea and certainly should improve the workings of the Urban Leagues throughout the country."

... Miss Marion L. Forrester, Exec. Secy.
Englewood Urban League

"I have read with great interest of your contest and consider it extremely important both as a promotion and as a method for inspiring our young clerical workers to greater achievements."

... W. H. Butler, Editor
TRAVELGUIDE

"With every good wish for the success of your contest, which is success for the League..."

... Dr. Sadie T. M. Alexander,
NUL Board Member.

ACC's Founder writes:

"Organization of our Council is the beginning of a new day - not only for us as a group, but for our parent organization which not only permitted us to see the light of day at a NUL Conference, but has made it possible for us to grow and develop in an excellent environment with the blessing and encouragement of our Executive Director, Lester B. Granger. It is fitting that in this conference we will have an opportunity to affirm the purpose for which we have been organized; take cognizance of our full responsibility and acknowledge our abiding faith in its program... Let us strive for full participation and integration of every staff member and friend working for the common purpose of the League, for the common society in which we work, and the common community which we serve."

... Mrs. Christina F. Jeffries,
Urban League of Pittsburgh.

Urban League Honor Winners

A CLEVELAND SECRETARY, Mrs. Alice G. Collum, won top honors in the National Urban League's 1951 contest for "Urban League Secretary of the Year" and, in addition to the title, was awarded a $100 Defense Bond and a Remington Portable. Mrs. Collum has been with the League at Cleveland for eleven years as secretary-bookkeeper (office manager, too) and now secretary to the executive director there. She had previously been clerk-typist with NYA, stenographer at Outhwaite Homes (FHA), and secretary in a law firm. She is an accomplished tennis player, bowler, and horsewoman—with many medals and trophies to her credit; and, more lately, she has become a golf enthusiast also. She is active in various civic and social organizations, has helped promote numerous educational projects, and has participated on panels in several career conferences, literary forums, and discussion groups. Mrs. Collum also does a clever job of narrating for fashion shows in and around Ohio. An unusually versatile young woman!

Alice G. Collum

Ruth Allen King

Mrs. King is one of the most popular secretaries in the movement, but she was not eligible for top place because of her connection with the National Office in New York City, where she is administrative secretary in the Industrial Relations Department and private secretary to the department head. She has been at Headquarters since 1929—her first job. Mrs. King was named "Special National Awardee" and given her trip to St. Paul and a radio-phonograph console.

Ruth Elizabeth Williams
Secretary to Massachusetts Governor

Contest results were announced at the League's annual conference at St. Paul in September, and Mrs. Collum was officially crowned. Present to perform the ceremony was the Administrative and Clerical Council's "Honorary Secretary of the Year," Mrs. Ruth Elizabeth Williams, who is secretary to Governor Paul Dever of Massachustts, as she had been to Governor Tobin before he became Secretary of Labor.

Dear Mr. Alston:

In Washington recently I had opportunity to talk with Mr. Robert R. Granville, Executive Secretary of the Committee on Government Contract Compliance.

I learned that the U. S. Government publishes daily, I think, or at least weekly, an unassorted miscellaneous list of Government contracts awarded. Each list is huge. The task of sub-dividing it by States or by categories of work to be done would be considerable for any agency placing itself in regular receipt of the lists. Of course, as a service to the public the Government ought to classify the list itself. No one would tell me why the Government does not, but it is easy to see that the unbalance as to States in which contracts are awarded would be a consideration in the minds of Government officials.

I wonder if the National Urban League could not take on the clerical work of sub-dividing the list and notifying its branches, and probably the public, as to the award of contracts covered by the executive order?

I can see how the Urban League's branches could grow greatly in enforcement service if theye were general knowledge of the plants and firms in each area of the country operating under the non-discrimination clause.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

This is to acknowledge receipt of your letter of December 2, referring to the anticipated news story which is to be released by the New York Times.

It seems as though our efforts are still bearing fruit in terms of publicity or distribution of information, which was compiled through the cooperation of the various organizations in the Southern Region.

I am sure that the above news story will have its effect upon the whole country, and not just the Southern Region alone.

I regret that I was unable to attend the meeting, which was scheduled for Nashville, Tennessee, however I hope that I will receive a report on the same.

EARL B. DICKERSON, President A. L. FOSTER, Exec. Director

Some people have come to Chicago only recently
To work in our industries—
To make new homes—
To give their children a better chance.

TO THE NEWCOMERS
THE CHICAGO URBAN LEAGUE SAYS —

Welcome!

Chicago is a BIG city in a good State and people have rights here that they don't have in some other places.

For instance, EVERYBODY is equal before the law. A Negro, Jewish, Mexican or White American will get justice in Illinois courts.

That's fair — as it should be!

And here's something else —

Illinois has a Civic Rights Law so that NOBODY can be barred from any theater — or restaurant — or bathing beach — or public park — or hotel
BECAUSE OF HIS RACE, COLOR, OR CREED!

But!
If anybody tries to deny us our rights —
We don't get tough and talk loud or Start a fight —

We go straight and report that person to the N.A.A.C.P. or the Civil Liberties Committee or the Chicago Urban League.

Then — we fight — in court — BY LAW!

On the other hand,
If we want to keep our rights, we've got to face our responsibilities too.

We ought to join a CHURCH and send the children to SUNDAY SCHOOL. At church you can meet the right sort of people and make good friends.

And LABOR UNIONS — we ought to be active in them. If we are members, we gain many things that we probably couldn't get by ourselves — shorter working hours, better working conditions, more pay.

We should join the PARENT-TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION at the school our children attend. It's important to know how children act away from home — and what other people think of them.

Parents and teachers have more to do with the kind of people we are than anybody else. 'Cause in the first few years, they're the ones who tell us right from wrong — and how to act — and how to talk — and what kind of life we should want.

And another thing about the children —
They shouldn't be roaming around the street
Day and night — playing with ruffians —
Learning bad habits and language.

No sir! The boys could go to the Y.M.C.A. at 3633 South Wabash Ave., or to the Boys' Club at 3949 South Michigan. Kids play basketball there, and swim and have a lot of fun. They learn things too, how to make things and build things.

The Y.W.C.A. at 4559 South Parkway is a swell place for girls to go. They have dance groups there and clubs for girls of different ages.

Then there are other places — community houses — where both boys and girls can go and enjoy themselves. At 700 Oakwood Boulevard there's the Lincoln Center for the children that live near there.

We need to use these places!

And there's Parkway Community House. It has activities for both children and grown-ups. Parents meet there and talk about all kinds of things. And at Parkway, there is a child care department where the tots can be left while mothers are at work. The address is 5120 South Parkway.

There are so many places that kids can go —

Such as Bethel Parish House, 4448 South Michigan Ave. and the South Side Settlement House at 3201 South Wabash Ave. — or the Helping Hand Day Nursery in the same neighborhood, 3124 South Vernon — centers for children of all ages.

Even two of the South Side schools have child care centers — Willard at 4615 South St. Lawrence and McCosh School at 66th and Champlain.

We need to use these places!

You know — a BIG city is just a group of small towns put together. Every neighborhood is a sort of town by itself.

People in a neighborhood should know each other — and take pride and interest in their "town."

They should form neighborhood clubs to get things done — such as regular garbage collection, and keeping streets and alleys clean.

Now — that means you've got to know your Alderman and the Superintendent of Streets and Alleys for your ward.

WARD	ALDERMAN	SUPERINTENDENTS

6th	Francis J. Hogan, 7014 South Vernon	6401 Evans Avenue, Pla. 8418

And law-breakers — don't let them give the neighborhood a bad name!

Call the police! They can settle the disturbance.

These are South Side police stations—

A BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF THE COMMUNITY RELATIONS PROJECT

Probably the most significant development in wartime social work among Negroes has been the approach of a team of 12 national agencies to social problems of Negroes in cities through what is called a Community Relations Project. Financed by the General Education Board and administered by the National Urban League, the project embodies an approach to selected cities experiencing latent race tensions and additional war impacts upon the already existing social problems of their Negro populations.

An Advisory Committee, representing participating agencies and lay membership, has been organized. The agencies represented on this Advisory Committee include: Family Welfare Association, Child Welfare League, National Tuberculosis Association, National Federation of Settlements, Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, National Organization for Public Health Nursing, National Health Council, National Committee on Housing, American War-Community Services, and Community Chests and Councils.

Although only five cities have been chosen for intensive work during the first year of the project, the National Urban League plans to continue the program until at least thirty industrial centers have been benefited. Supervision and administration of the Project is carried on by Warren M. Banner, Director of Research and Community Projects for the League, and William H. Dean, Project Director, who is on leave from his post as Professor of Economics at Atlanta University.

Working at the invitation of and in cooperation with the local Council of Social Agencies or some other overall sponsoring body, the project features a complete study of the socio-economic conditions of Negroes in the city and the resources for meeting them. This is followed by the work of a team of five specialists in health-and-hospitalization, housing, group work-and-recreation, employment, and family-and-child welfare. These specialists work with local agencies to complete a blueprint for local Negro social welfare and help devise the machinery by which the plan may be put into effect over the next several years.

Affiliated with social agencies in 51 American cities working for better race relations, health, housing, recreation, employment, and other social services among Negroes.

The project also furnishes later consultant and follow-up service.

The potentialities of this method are suggested by the experience of the Council of Social Agencies in Miami, Fla., which invited the National Urban League to adapt the above procedure to Miami on a smaller scale, has accepted the ensuing recommendations unanimously, and confidently expects to put most of them into effect within the next few years.

"A city applies for the Community Relations Project by writing the Southern Field Division, National Urban League, 158 Auburn Ave, Atlanta, Ga. There are no application blanks and applications are made by letter. The application should set forth a brief review of the social conditions existing in the city along with reasons why the local sponsoring group believes the Community Relations Project would make a contribution to local social work development. There should also be some indication of the local sponsoring group's desire to cooperate in trying to work out whatever machinery the study's results indicate as desirable.

"When this application is received, it is brought to the attention of the Project Advisory Committee for its approval. If approved, the local sponsoring group is notified, the date on which the study is to begin is set, and the local group (Council of Social Agencies) proceeds to make arrangements for carrying out its share of the responsibility. This responsibility includes: providing office space, telephone facilities, clerical assistance, and supplies for our representative while in the city; and formation of an Advisory committee for the study. We would expect, too, assistance in making contacts and interviews and would look for heads of local agencies to be available for consultation with our study director and staff.

Final preparation of the report is handled here in the National Urban League office. The over-all budget of the project provides for the financial costs, and aside from the items mentioned above, there is no expense to the local community.

"The local advisory committee for the study should be as broad and as representative as possible, its constituency to include, for example, representatives from the Community Chest, Council of Social Agencies, business, industry, public agencies (such as the Housing Authority, the Board of Health, the police department, etc.) the clergy (both white and Negro), the general community, and the Negro community(lay representation). We have found that a committee of about a dozen persons, plus the ex officio representatives, constitutes a good working group. These persons should be approached immediately after approval of the project so that the first meeting of the committee can be held during the first few days that the study director is in the field. This local committee helps the study director to frame the survey's outline and to fit his general plan into the distinctive pattern of the city. It meets regularly to receive progress reports during the period when the study is being carried on. It joins with the National Urban League in preparing the final report and setting up the recommendations for community action. And, it cooperates in carrying out these recommendations.

"The initial study does not, by an means, constitute the whole of the project. Equally important is the follow-up of the study by a staff of specialists. These specialists, forming a team which represents the various interests in the fields of concern to the study (Family and Child Welfare, Health-and-Hospitalization, Housing, Vocational Adjustment, and Recreation-and-Work), will spend from four to six weeks conferring with the local officials and agency heals on ways in which the project recommendations can be carried out. In this connection, the National Urban League serves as the coordinating agent, representing the National Agencies which are participating in the study.

"The specialists staff, individually, represent those national agencies active in their fields. Those agencies have accredited the specialists as representing national policy and experience in Housing, Health, Family Care, or whatever the field may be.

"Thus, our plan puts into each of the project cities a team of experienced and able professional social workers who can bring their joint wisdom and skill to bear upon social problems that call for every possible resource of assistance.

William Y. Bell, Jr.
Southern Field Director

PS - I should mention here that in addition to the studies carried on and contemplated under this particular project, the National Urban League's Research Department has made studies of the Negro population (without the follow-up of the team of specialists) for Councils of Social Agencies in such widely dispersed cities as: Miami, Fla., Grand Rapids, Mich., Seattle, Wash., Hartford, Conn., Columbus, O., Newark, N.J., St. Louis, Mo., etc.

The Project Director has just completed the first phase of the project's study in Houston, Texas and is moving on to Oklahoma, City, Okla. and Kansas City, Mo., to initiate the project there. Councils of Social Agencies in St. Petersburg and Jacksonville, Flordia are also interested and negotiating with the Project Committee.
